OBSERVATIONS ON THE HISTORY OF PHARAOH.

I

EXOD. iv. 21. And the Lord said unto Moses, when thou goest to return into Egypt, see thou do all those wonders before Pharaoh, which I have put in thine hand: but I will harden his heart, that he shall not let the people go.

THE history of Pharaoh, which makes so conspicuous a figure in the Bible, being annually read in the church; there being some things in it hard to be understood; and the predestinarians interpreting the circumstance of God's hardening his heart, to prove that he was under an eternal and irresistible decree of reprobation from God; so that he could not do otherwise than he did do—fill up the measure of his iniquity, by obstinately resisting the will of God—perish miserably in this world, and, under the wrath of God, sink into endless perdition in the world to come: I have thought it best, ac-according to my ability, to make such observations on the history of Pharaoh, as shall set his conduct in its true and natural light.

If I can hereby vindicate the ways of God, and shew him to be, what both reason and revelation teach us to believe, infinite in justice and truth, in goodness and mercy, I shall think myself happy.

That Pharaoh was not a mere machine, acting under a fatal necessity, but a free agent as other men are, and could have acted otherwise than he did act, will, I trust, appear from his history; and will make his example a proper admonition and caution to us with regard to our own conduct.

Before I proceed in the subject before me, I have to remark, that at the time when Pharaoh lived, idolatry, or the worship of false gods, had made considerable progress in the world. It seems to be the opinion of the learned, that idolatry first began in Chaldea, before the exodus of Abraham from thence; and that the sun, and moon, and stars, called in the scripture the host of heaven, were the first objects of it. Very probably arguments are urged to show, that the tower of Babel, where God confounded the language of mankind, was built with a view to the worship of the sun. His bright and glorious appearance when shining in full splendour; the daily course he unremittingly observed; the perpetual efflux of light and heat which proceeded from him as from an inexhaustible fountain, which were so necessary to the fecundity of the earth and salubrity of the air, all concurred to impress speculative men with the notion that he was the God of this world, to whom they owed all the good things they enjoyed from it: and

When, in conjunction with the sun, they observed the moon and stars to mark more precisely the divisions of time and the return of seasons, they would be easily led to consider them as co-efficient, or, at least, subordinate divinities, acting under him in the benevolent business of blessing the earth and its inhabitants.

When men begin to speculate and philosophise in matters of religion, it is impossible to say how far they shall proceed, or where stop. The warmth of the sun was necessary to vegetation: to make it abundant, tillage was necessary also. The strength, and patience, and docility of the ox, or bullock, pointed him out as the animal most fit for this business; and his usefulness was found so great, that part, at least, of that adoration which was due only to the Creator and Governor of the universe, was transferred to the brute animal who turned the earth with the plough to lighten the labour and fatigue of man.

But wherever idolatry began, what was its origin, what its progress; previous to the exodus of the Israelites from Egypt, it had deeply infected that country. Not only the host of heaven, but the river Nile, to whose annual overflowing the amazing fruitfulness of their country was owing, the sacred bullock, under the name of Apis, were esteemed and worshipped as supreme deities.

The Israelites had long sojourned in Egypt, first as friends, then as slaves. It appears to have been the intention of God, by means of this people, to retain the world in the knowledge and worship of himself. the true God, the Creator and Governor of all things that exist, in opposition to the growing infatuation of idolatry and polytheism which was then overspreading the world; more especially to preserve, as far as possible, from all the pollutions of idolatry and false worship, that people from whom Messiah, the Redeemer and Saviour of men, was, according to the flesh, to come into the world.

Previously, therefore, to his giving them a religion immediately from heaven, for the rule of their conduct, the fundamental laws of which were afterward delivered to them from the midst of thunder and lightning on Mount Sinai—it was necessary to convince the Israelites that the God of their fathers, of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, who then interposed between them and Pharaoh for their deliverance from bondage, was really and truly the supreme and only God, the Creator of the world and of man and all things in it, the only object of adoration: that, therefore, it was their duty to worship him only—to do all that he commanded—to forbear every thing which he forbid.

As Creator of the world, he was superior to all the powers of nature; as Governor of the world, he could reward or punish; and as a just and equal Governor, he would punish the transgressors of his laws, and reward those who were obedient to them. To make impression deeply on their minds, and to convince them that Moses was the servant and vicegerent of God to them, no method could have been more effectual than the contest between God and Pharaoh, which was carried on before their eyes, and which ended in their deliverance from the slavery of Egypt.

This lesson was necessary for them. Their long intercourse with the Egyptians had, in some degree at least, corrupted their religious principles, and gave them a fondness for the Egyptian gods and rites of worship. Soon after the delivery of the law from Mount Sinai, they shewed their propensity to the idolatry of the country where they had so long inhabited. Upon the delay of Moses to return from the mount, they supposed he had perished in the fire which burned on it. Being without a leader, and destitute of one to communicate the divine will to them, they had immediate recourse to the idolatrous superstition of Egypt; made an image of the god Apis—a calf or young bullock—proclaimed to the congregation, “These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt.” Before this calf Aaron built an altar, and ordered a feast to be held to the Lord the next day, when sacrifices were offered, and religious adoration paid to it.

It cannot be supposed that the Israelites were so stupid as to think the calf which they then made was really the God who had delivered them from Egypt. It is more probable that they supposed the calf to be an emblem or representation of God, through which they were to worship him, and receive communications of his will. This notion was agreeable to the philosophy of that time, and thought to be the dictate of reason and nature. Strong, indeed, must have been their propensity to it, when neither the wonders wrought by Moses in Egypt, which demonstrated the power of God to be superior to all nature, nor the bright effulgence of his glory on Mount Sinai, which appeared like flaming fire, and proved God to be invisible, could wean them from it, or make them regard the second precept of their decalogue, which prohibited the worshipping God by images, or endeavouring to represent him by any sensible things.

Several circumstances in the history of Pharaoh give us reason to suppose that he was of a proud, obstinate, and cruel temper. He knew no power superior to his own, and he had been used to make his own will the rule of his conduct. The more obstinate and self-willed he was, the more proper subject was he for God to act on. He, therefore, displayed his power on Pharaoh, because he would resist it to the utmost, and give him a fair opportunity of proving to him, to the Egyptians, to the Israelites, to the whole world, that God, who demanded the dismissal of the Israelites, was, indeed, the God of the universe, who created and who governs the world and all things in it; and, therefore, the only proper object of worship and adoration.

Before Joseph was carried into Egypt, a body of people, under the denomination of the Shepherds, had had overrun the middle and lower part of that country, and held it more than three hundred years. They were, probably, the Harites, whom the children of Esau had driven from Mount Hor. By one of their kings, Joseph had been advanced, and his father and family invited into Egypt and kindly treated. Cherished by the indulgence of the court, and the country of the Egyptians, they greatly increased.

Joseph continued prime minister and chief governor of Egypt for eighty years. During all that time, his prudent management kept the kingdom in peace. After his death, the old Egyptians, who had kept possession of the Upper Egypt, made war upon the shepherds, and, being joined by the Lower Egypt, which revolted from them, drove them out, and took complete possession of the country. Most probably the Israelites assisted their friends the shepherds in this war, so unfortunate for them. This may have been the reason why the king and victorious Egyptians made slaves of the Israelites, and so cruelly oppressed them.

However that be, the new king, it is said, "knew not Joseph." He was of a people entirely distinct from, and victorious over the king and people who had been so kind and hospitable to the Israelites. He knew not, at least he regarded not the preservation of Egypt, which had been effected by the prudent conduct of Joseph under the shepherd kings. He seems to have feared that the shepherds who had been driven out might meditate a return, and, if they should be joined by the Israelites, might be too powerful for him: he, therefore, proposed to his council to "work wisely with them, lest they multiply, and it come to pass if there be war, they join themselves unto our enemies, and fight against us, and get them out of the land.”

To part with so large a number of slaves was grating to his avaricious temper: besides, his kingdom was to be fortified and rendered defensible against his enemies. His first project was to break down their strength and spirit by hard labour. Task-masters were set over them; and they were compelled to work in brick and mortar, and in the field; and Pithan and Raames were built, or rather fortified by their labour.*

This rigorous servitude seems to have begun about thirty or forty years after Joseph's death; but it was so far from diminishing the number of the Israelites, that, by the particular favour of God, they increased more under it than they had done before. Other councils were therefore to be pursued; and that which appeared to this cruel king as the most likely to answer his purpose, was to have all the male children of Israel destroyed as soon as they were born. The midwives were first desired to carry this cruel order into execution; but their humanity and conscience revolted against it. An edict was then published, requiring that all the male infants of the Israelites should be drowned in the Nile; and measures were taken to execute it with rigour. To what degree the Israelites suffered by it is not particularly mentioned: but while it was in force, Moses was born of the tribe of Levi; and by the precautions taken by his parents, they seem to have been in great dread of the fatal effects of the king's order. Being exposed among the flags at the edge of the river, in a basket made of rushes, and secured from the water by pitch, he was found by the daughter of Pharaoh, who went thither to bathe. Josephus informs us, that she was married to an Egyptian prince, but had no children. This circumstance may have excited her humanity, when she saw the helpless and wretched state of the exposed infant. She relieved him from his danger, gave him his own mother for his nurse, adopted him for her son, and educated him in all the learning and policy of Egypt.

This king of Egypt, who knew not Joseph, is by Josephus called Amasis. He is not distinguished in the Bible by any particular name: the appellation of Pharaoh being common to all the kings of Egypt, till long after that period.

As we read no more of the destruction of the Israelitish infants, it is probable the influence of the daughter of Pharaoh obtained the repeal, or the mitigation of the horrid edict against them. Their servitude, however, continued, and their labour was rigorously executed; insomuch that their heart became exceeding sad, and their lives were made bitter by reason of the labour that was required of them.

Moses, notwithstanding his adoption into the family of Pharaoh in his infancy, and his education in his court, knew his descent. Probably he had been informed by his parents, whom he might continue to visit after he was removed from their care, that the Israelites were his brethren, and he himself descended of the family of Levi. That he should visit them frequently will not, therefore, appear strange, nor be unaccountable: nor have we reason to suppose that his visits were idle ones. Seeing their affliction, he would naturally employ in their favour the interest he had at court, especially with the daughter of the king. In one of these visits, when he was about forty years old, seeing an Egyptian beating an Israelite; he killed and buried him. He hoped that by this action his countrymen would be led to consider him as their avenger and deliverer; but in that light they regarded him not. Pharaoh, being informed of the conduct of Moses, was determined to put him to death—so much had he interfered with his views and policy. But Moses fled from him into the land of Midian, and was there forty years with Jethro the priest and prince of his country, the descendant of Abraham by Ketura, and a worshipper of the true God. Attending the flocks of Jethro, whose daughter Zipporah he had married, he drove them to the further side of Mount Horeb, for the sake of pasturage. There God appeared, or manifested himself to him, in a flame of fire in a bush, shrub of thorns; which, though it appeared to be totally on fire, was not at all consumed.

Before this event, the king of Egypt, from whom Moses had fled, died. But his successor pursuing the same oppressive conduct to the Israelites, they, in their distress, cried unto God. Remembering his promise to their ancestors, the time of the accomplishment of which approached, he determined to deliver them from their servitude; and to deliver them in such a way as should make it evident both to the Israelites and to the Egyptians, that the God of Israel was the God of the universe, superior to every power in nature; and, therefore, the only rightful object of adoration, the only sure foundation of faith and confidence.

With this intention God appointed Moses his ambassador, and sent him unto Pharaoh to demand the dismissal of his people, the Israelites, from the servitude in which he kept them. At the same time, he informed Moses, that the king of Egypt would not willingly let them depart; but that a mighty hand, and a strong arm, and many judgments executed in the midst of Egypt, would be necessary to procure their deliverance: he, therefore, directed Moses to perform some particular miracles before the elders of Israel, and before Pharaoh, to convince them that God Almighty, the God of the universe, he to whom all the elements of the world, all the powers of nature were subject, had really sent him on this business. "And," said God to Moses, "when thou goest to return into Egypt, see thou do all those wonders before Pharaoh which I have put in thine hand; but I will harden his heart, that he shall not let the people go."

It is plain from the text, that God had not yet hardened the heart of Pharaoh. The highest, the fullest, the strongest sense that can be put on the text can only amount to a threat, that God would, some time after, harden his heart. But as the threats of God are always conditional, and suspended on the good or evil conduct of the subject of them, the execution of this threat to harden Pharaoh's heart must have depended on his after conduct. Its utmost meaning can only be, that Pharaoh would not willingly let them go, but only as compelled by severe judgments: for God had previously said, (chap. iii. 20.) "I will stretch out my hand, and smite Egypt with all my wonders which I will do in the midst thereof: And after that he (Pharaoh) will let you go."

Accordingly we find that Pharaoh long resisted the will of God, and endured the plagues which were inflicted on him—often relented, and as often hardened his heart. But upon the destruction of the first-born, his heart was so broken down by the judgments of God, that he not only permitted the Israelites to depart, but was urgent to get them out of his kingdom. The Egyptians also joined in hastening them away, and readily gave or lent unto them such things as they required, jewels of silver, and gold, and raiment.*

Moses undertook this business with great reluctance. He knew the difficulty of the undertaking,

* The loan of these things to the Israelites does not appear to have been a temporary one to be returned again after a time, nor to have been so understood by the Egyptians; but a compensation to the Israelites for their labour, and to induce them readily and quietly to leave their country. They had long served the Egyptians in hard labour; and it was but reasonable that some compensation should be made to them; especially as they were hurried out of the land, and had no opportunity of preparing for their journey.

both on account of the haughty, cruel, and covetous temper of the king and people of Egypt, and of the fervile, discontented, and querulous temper and habits of the Israelites. Upon his complaining of a hesitation in his speech, God, for his encouragement, joined his brother Aaron with him as his second in the embassy; because Aaron was a good and eloquent speaker. He then commanded him to perform certain signs and wonders before the elders of Israel, and before Pharaoh, that they might believe and know that he was sent of God.

When he set out to return into Egypt, by the direction of God, Aaron met him near Horeb: to him Moses communicated all that God had said; and they went into Egypt together. Having assembled the elders and heads of the tribes of Israel, he declared to them the business on which he had come, viz. to make known to them the purpose of God, to deliver them by his hand from the bondage under which they groaned. And to convince them of the truth of what he said, he performed before them the signs which God had commanded.

Suffering as the people were under the burden of slavery, the message of Moses was a cordial to their hearts: eagerly did they receive it; and, greatly rejoicing that God had remembered their affliction, and visited them under it, they bowed themselves in grateful adoration, and with joyful hearts worshipped Jehovah.

Having, in the progress of this business, attended Moses and Aaron into Egypt, let us stop for a few minutes, and see whether some reflections, useful to us in the christian life, cannot be drawn from that part of the subject which has been before us.

It appears, from the preceding enumeration of particulars, that the promises of God are a sure ground for our faith to rest on, under all circumstances, however adverse and distressing. He had told Abram that his seed should be strangers and servants, and in an afflicted state, for four hundred years. That he would then judge the nation whom they should serve: that they should come out from this servitude with great substance, and possess the country of the Amorites, (Gen. xv. 13, &c.)

To this promise God adverted, when he told Moses that he was the God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob: that he was come down to fulfil his promise to them, by bringing the Israelites out of Egypt, and giving them the country he had promised their fathers to give them. This promise he did exactly fulfil; he did judge and punish the Egyptians for their injustice and cruelty; he did bring out the Israelites from under their slavery; and did settle them fully in the country of Canaan, and under the conduct of Moses and Joshua.

To us, too, God hath made most gracious and precious promises: that though we are strangers and sojourners in this world, and have no abiding city; but are exposed to the troubles and afflictions of this mortal life, to the temptations of satan, and to the servitude of sin, he will, in his own good time, deliver his penitent, faithful servants from them all, and bring them into the heavenly Canaan, his own eternal kingdom—the rest reserved for the people of God, through the mediation of his Son, our Redeemer, Jesus Christ, and under the conduct of the Holy Ghost, his own most blessed Spirit. Let us, then, be careful to love the Lord our God, who hath done such great things for us, and promised such mighty blessings to us—his Son for our redemption, his Holy Spirit for our sanctification, the kingdom of heaven for our eternal inheritance; and not be like the Jews, a hard-hearted and a stiff-necked people, who set not their heart aright, nor kept the commandments of God, but rebelled against his word, disbelieved his promises, and resisted his will; lest the oath of rejection be pronounced against us, as it was against the Israelites who came out of Egypt—"ye shall not enter into my rest."

The backwardness of Moses to become the ambassador of God to Pharaoh is, indeed, an extraordinary circumstance. He well knew the power of God, and the promise he had made to Abraham. He knew the bitter servitude which his brethren endured, and anxiously wished their deliverance from it. His discouragements probably were, his want of confidence in his own capacity; his opinion of the proud and cruel temper of the Egyptians, and their hatred to the Israelites; his distrust of the steadiness and fortitude of his countrymen; and his apprehension that the business must be accomplished by war, for which he knew them to be unprepared and unfit.

We know it is equally easy with God to deliver his servants by any means he shall chuse, however weak and insignificant they may appear to human apprehension. This, no doubt, was the sense which Moses entertained of the power of God, as well as it is ours; and yet such is the infirmity of nature, that he could not easily bring himself to act on an opinion which he knew was founded in truth. When, however, he had consented to become the ambassador of God to Pharaoh on this occasion, we find no more diffidence in him; no hesitation to do whatever God commanded; so that he hath obtained the attestation of St. Paul, that he was faithful to him that appointed him.

In prosecution of this commission, Moses was soon convinced, by his own observation, of the truth of what he had before firmly believed—that God could make the most contemptible of his creatures—frogs, locusts, flies, lice—the instruments of his justice, to punish the cruelty and humble the pride of insolent Pharaoh. How vain is human power, when it exalts itself against God! Dreadful are his judgments when called down by cruelty and oppression!

The Israelites had been invited to settle in Egypt by former kings: probably they had taken part with their friends, the shepherds, when they were attacked by the old Egyptians: falling under their power in the issue of the war, they were reduced to the most bitter distress. In addition to the hard labour which was rigorously exacted of them, their children were taken from them and thrown into the river. God sees and regards the cruelty with which his servants are treated: he sleepeth not, but will, in his own time, call the offenders to justice for their crimes. Dreadful was his judgment in this case—All the first born of the children of the Egyptians were, in one night, cut off by the angel of death.

Let us revere the judgments of God, and be careful to cultivate the virtues of humanity and mercy, which are so very dear to him. Remember, therefore, that every man, even the slave who depends on our will, is our brother—the creature of the same God—the partaker of the same nature with ourselves; and justice and christianity require that he be treated accordingly. So will God bless us and keep us from evil, and give us the reward of our humanity and mercy in his heavenly kingdom.

DISCOURSE I.

PART THE SECOND.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE HISTORY OF PHARAOH.

IT hath been observed, that when God determined to deliver the Israelites from the slavery of Egypt, he appointed Moses his ambassador to the king of the country, to treat with him about the dismissal of that people from their servitude whom God claimed as his own. The credentials of Moses were the signs and wonders which God had commanded him to perform before Pharaoh, that he might know that God had sent him, and that he made his demand by the authority of God.

On no other ground can this transaction be clearly understood, or fairly explained. The people of Israel were the peculiar people of God. He had appropriated them to himself with the consent of their forefathers, Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob. They were to be his people, and he was to be their

God. This people Pharaoh held in bondage, and God sent to demand them from him. The stile in which Moses made his demand was that of an ambassador—not in his own name as principal, nor in the name of the people as their representative, but in the name of God most high: “Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Let my people go, that they may hold a feast unto me in the wilderness,” was his address to Pharaoh. The answer of Pharaoh was impious, as well as haughty: “Who is the Lord,” of whom you tell me, “that I should obey his voice to let Israel go? I know not the Lord, neither will I let Israel go.”

The business was now brought to a point. God had demanded, and Pharaoh had refused to dismiss the Israelites whom both claimed. It now remained to be determined whose servants they should be, whether God’s, who claimed them by the prior right of a covenant with the head and founder of their nation; or Pharaoh’s, who claimed them as his slaves by the conquest his predecessors had made of the country where they resided.

In this contest, Pharaoh took the first step by increasing the labour of the Israelites: for no sooner had Moses made his demand, than the imagination seized him, that the Israelites had too much leisure; that they had been caballing together, and had employed Moses and Aaron to solicit leave for them to quit the country, under the pretence of sacrificing unto their God. That they might have full employ for the time which he supposed they had spent in idleness and private intrigues, he directed that the straw which was necessary for the making of bricks should be no longer supplied to them.*

Wanting straw, the Israelites were obliged to ramble over the fields to collect stubble: of course they could not daily deliver in the usual number of bricks which they used to do, and which was still required of them. On this account their officers, who, under the Egyptian task-masters, had been appointed to superintend their labour, were beaten.

In their distress these officers applied to Pharaoh, but could obtain no mitigation of their labour, or allowance of straw: "Ye are idle, ye are idle," said Pharaoh; "therefore ye say, let us go, and do sacrifice to the Lord. Go, therefore, now and work; for there shall no straw be given you, yet shall ye deliver the tale of bricks."

Dejected and dispirited by the heart-breaking repulse, they met Moses and Aaron, who seem to have been waiting for their return from Pharaoh. In bitterness of soul they appealed unto God against them, that instead of delivering them from servitude, they had occasioned the increase of their labour and sufferings, had raised Pharaoh's indignation against them, and armed him with a fair pretence for destroying them.

* The operation of brick-making in Egypt and in the eastern countries is very different from what it is in Europe. Their bricks are only mortar made of clay, with which straw is mixed to make it hold together. They mould them of different sizes, according to the use for which they intend them, and dry them in the sun. Of these bricks, laid in mortar, they build their houses, covering the bricks with plaister within and without. On this subject Bishop Lowth quotes Sir John Chardin and Maundrell. See note on Isaiah ix. 9.

Moses seems to have been deeply affected by their remonstrance. Instead of replying to them, “ he returned unto the Lord,”* and broke out in an expostulation which does not seem consistent with his meek and faithful character; “ Lord, wherefore hast thou so evil intreated this people? why is it that thou hast sent me? For since I came to Pharaoh to speak in thy name, he hath done evil to this people; neither hast thou delivered thy people at all.”

To these complaints of Moses, God returns a precise answer, after cautioning him against impatience and despondency in his present situation: “ Now,” that is, in the issue, “ thou shalt see what I will do to Pharaoh.” By his name Jehovah importing the invisible essence and immutability of God, who gives certainty to his promises by fulfilling them, he declares that he remembered his covenant with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, to give the land of Canaan to their posterity, and to judge the nation who should oppress them, and that he would make it good. With a strong hand he would oblige Pharaoh to let them go, and even to drive them out of his land.

This message Moses delivered unto the Israelites, as God had commanded. But such was their dejection and anguish of heart, from their cruel bondage, that they would receive neither courage nor consolation from any thing that he could say.

* From this and similar expressions, the opinion of Bishop Patrick, that there was some fixed place where the Shechinah appeared, and where Moses could consult God, is highly probable.

Nor does it appear that Moses had recovered his spirits, or acquired any confidence in the business in which he was engaged: for when God directed him to go again unto Pharaoh, and repeat his demand for the dismissal of the Israelites, he answered, "Behold the children of Israel have not hearkened unto me, how then shall Pharaoh hear me, who am of uncircumcised lips?" This is an Hebrew phrase, and means that he could not speak readily and without stammering. To the hesitation in his speech he seems to have imputed his want of success both with the Israelites and with Pharaoh. For his encouragement, God said to him, "See, I have made thee a God to Pharaoh; and Aaron, thy brother, shall be thy prophet. Thou shalt speak all that I command thee;" that is, to Aaron; "and Aaron, thy brother, shall speak unto Pharaoh, that he send the children of Israel out of his land."

And that Moses might no longer think that the impediment in his speech had been any disadvantage to the message he had delivered, God informed him again, that Pharaoh's inattention was owing to another cause—"I will harden Pharaoh's heart," said God, "and multiply my signs and my wonders in the land of Egypt. But Pharaoh shall not hearken unto you; that I may lay my hand upon Egypt, and bring forth mine armies, my people, the children of Israel, out of the land of Egypt by great judgments. And the Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord," &c.

In this transaction there are two things which deserve our notice: The infirmity of human nature which appeared in Moses—the goodness and mercy which God manifested, both to him and to Pharaoh.

The infirmity in Moses showed itself in two instances. One was his mentioning a second time the hesitation in his speech, as a disqualification for executing the commission which God had given to him. What God had said to him formerly at Horeb ought to have satisfied him, and silenced his apprehensions forever. Neither the dejection nor pusillanimity of the Israelites, nor the haughty and arrogant behaviour of Pharaoh, would have damped his courage, or checked his prospect of a happy issue of the negociation in which he was engaged, had he fully believed God. He would have borne the inconvenience of a slow or stammering utterance without repining, knowing it to be the will of God, who was all-sufficient for every thing, and could accomplish his purposes by any means he should choose; knowing too, that the glory of God, not the honour of the agent, was the great object in view; and that his glory would appear conspicuous in proportion to the imbecility and unfitness of the agent by whom it was effected.

This last declaration of God to him was accompanied with a solemn charge; “Speak thou unto Pharaoh, king of Egypt, all that I say unto thee;” which seems to have satisfied all the doubts, and silenced all the scruples of Moses. Without any distrust of the issue, he seems ever after to have followed the directions which God gave him.

The other instance of human infirmity in Moses was the impatience he showed at the forbearance of God toward Pharaoh: “Since I came to Pharaoh to speak in thy name, he hath done evil to this people; neither hast thou delivered this people at all.” He certainly expected, when Pharaoh so haughtily rejected the demand which he had made in the name of God to have the Israelites dismissed, that the divine vengeance would instantly have burst on his head. Seeing nothing of this happen, and the only effect of his application to be the greater oppression of his nation, he seems to have supposed that God had given up the matter, and that there was no prospect of the deliverance of Israel. Had he remembered what God had said of the obstinacy of Pharaoh’s will, he never would have expressed himself in this manner.

Gracious is God, as well as righteous; merciful, as well as just. It is his property to overlook the infirmities of his servants, and long to delay the punishment of the wicked—therefore Moses escaped correction. And though the final issue of Pharaoh’s conduct was fully known to God, and he might then have justly cut him off for his impiety, his example would have been of less service to the world, from its ignorance of the height of his impiety, and of the justice of God’s visitation upon him. That the long suffering of God might appear, it was necessary that Pharaoh should fill up the measure of his iniquity, before the vengeance of heaven fell on him. Neither would the goodness of God have so eminently appeared, had Pharaoh been taken off by divine vengeance in the beginning of his wicked life, before his hard heart, and obstinate temper, and perverse opposition to the command of God, had fully showed themselves, and convinced all who beheld him how much he deserved the chastisement of heaven.

This very argument God afterward useth with Pharaoh: "For this cause have I raised thee up, for to show in thee my power; and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth." The marginal reading in our Bible is, made thee stand. For this cause have I hitherto preserved thee from destruction—not that thou didst not deserve to be destroyed, but because I knew thy obstinacy and self-will, and saw thee to be a fit object on which to show my power and supremacy over all things; that all the world might know that I am the supreme God, almighty in power, infinite in mercy, long suffering to sinners, and unwilling to punish, desirous of their repentance, that I may pardon their transgressions.

From the dejection of the Israelites upon their repulse from Pharaoh, we may learn the low and abject condition to which their slavery had reduced them. Their servile state had continued near one hundred and thirty years, and its rigour had so absolutely broken down their spirits, that they chose rather to submit tamely to it, rigid and severe as it was, than to use any exertion to free themselves from it. When Moses and Aaron first came to them with the good news that God had visited and would deliver them from their hard thralldom, and had performed the signs which God commanded before them, they believed, and, gratefully bowing their heads, worshipped the Lord who had visited them. Yet, on the insolent repulse from Pharaoh, in the matter of the straw, they were beyond measure dejected and spiritless. Their prospects were all clouded over; their hopes were at an end, and they would hear no more of deliverance and freedom, though declared and promised to them by Moses in the name of God.

When they at last marched out of Egypt, which probably was within a month of this time, we are told, there were six hundred thousand of them who were men. From so large a number, an army sufficient to have shaken Egypt to its centre might easily have been raised, had there been any spirit left in them. But so totally were they humbled and dispirited by their bondage, that they hearkened not unto Moses, for anguish of spirit and for cruel bondage. Better it appeared to them to serve the Egyptians, than to run any risks to be delivered from them. .

Their whole deliverance must, therefore, be from God. In themselves there was no energy; nor could they make any efforts that promised success. Probably, God suffered their thralldom to continue long, and to be very grievous, that their spirits being broken, and their hopes ended—their prospects annihilated, and their ability brought to nothing, their deliverance might more eminently appear to be the work of God only—the salvation of Jehovah: and that all who beheld them marching out of Egypt, in freedom and triumph, might say, “This is the finger of God”—this is the work of God most high, the Lord of nature, the supreme Governor of the universe—of every thing that exists; who doth, in heaven and in earth, whatsoever he pleaseth; none is able to resist his hand, or say unto him, “What doest thou?”

From the circumstances of this history which have been before us, it appears evidently, that God had not yet hardened Pharaoh’s heart, though he had twice threatened to do so—once in the text, and once in chap. vii. 3.

It hath been observed, that the threats of God are always conditional, and to be understood as founded on the ill conduct of the person threatened. If he repent, or forbear to do the wickedness for which he is threatened, the threat loses its force. When God said, “I will harden Pharaoh’s heart,” the meaning is, if he resist the evidence I shall give him; if he withstand the miracles which shall be wrought for his conviction; if he refuse to obey my requisition to let Israel depart from their servitude. The condition of the threat in chap. iv. 22, &c. is expressed, “Thus saith the Lord, Israel is my son, my first born. Let my son go, that he may serve me. If thou refuse to let him go, behold I will slay thy son, thy first born.”

Pharaoh having refused to let the people go, Moses and Aaron, by the direction of God, went to him; and, to convince him that they were really sent by Almighty God who was superior to, and commanded all the powers of nature, to demand the dismissal of the Israelites, “ Aaron cast down his rod before Pharaoh, and before his servants, and it became a serpent.” Hereupon Pharaoh sent for his wise men, the forcerers and magicians of Egypt, and they performed the same miracle; “ For they cast down every man his rod, and they became serpents.” It is added, “ But Aaron’s rod swallowed up their rods. And he hardened Pharaoh’s heart—he hearkened not unto them, as the Lord had said.”

Two questions here present themselves to us, which it will be right to determine if we can.

1. What is the meaning of the expression, And he hardened Pharaoh’s heart? To whom does the pronoun he relate? to God, to Moses, or to the magicians? Pharaoh seems to have supposed, that the turning of Aaron’s rod into a serpent was the effect of human art, or knowledge of the powers of nature. And he was determined to try whether the magicians of Egypt could not perform the same miracle.

Or, if he supposed this miracle to be performed by the power of the God of Israel, he might be willing to try, whether the gods of Egypt could not perform the same miracle by their servants the magicians, which the God of Israel had performed by Moses and Aaron.

On either supposition, if the magicians succeeded, why should Pharaoh suppose that Moses and Aaron acted by a power superior to them? If the miracle was wrought by divine power, the Gods of Egypt would appear to him capable of protecting him against the God of Israel, seeing they wrought the same miracle. Or if the turning of the rod into a serpent was the effect of art, and the knowledge of the powers of nature, it would appear to him that the magicians of Egypt were possessed of equal art, and knowledge of the powers of nature, with Moses and Aaron; and, therefore, were able to defend him against all they could do.

When, therefore, the rods of the magicians were turned into serpents, Pharaoh's heart was hardened; not surely by any act of God, but by the issue of the attempt of the magicians. The meaning, therefore, of the expression, And he hardened Pharaoh's heart, is, and Pharaoh's heart was hardened when he saw the magicians perform the same miracle which Moses and Aaron had done.

In 2 Sam. xxiv. 1. it is said, "The anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he moved David against them, to say, go number Israel and Judah." The construction refers the moving of David to God himself; yet, in the parallel passage, in Chron. xxi. 1. it is said, "Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel." In truth, the pride and vanity of David's heart excited him to this wickedness: Of these Satan availed himself, and his temptation was effectual: David was moved to number Israel.

The pride and covetousness of Pharaoh's heart had the same effect on him, and equally exposed him to the temptations of Satan. Too proud to submit to control, and too covetous to part with a numerous people, whom he considered as his slaves, he determined to run any risk rather than dismiss them. He, therefore, hardened his heart against the miracle that had been wrought for his conviction.

His conduct, however, was more hasty than became a prudent man. A very remarkable circumstance had happened in the contest between Moses and the magicians, which he seems entirely to have overlooked. No sooner were the rods of the magicians turned into serpents, than Aaron's rod swallowed them up. Strange would it have been, that this demonstrative proof of the superiority of the God of Israel over the gods of Egypt, and of the power by which Moses and Aaron acted above the power of the magicians, was not observed by Pharaoh and his servants, did not the whole history show, evidently, that their own will was what they strove to gratify at all hazard. Had that ominous circumstance been regarded as it ought to have been, they would have perceived that no dependence could be made on the power or art of the magicians, nor on any miracles they might perform, since the miracle they had wrought was immediately counteracted and destroyed by the supreme power of that God whose servants Moses and Aaron were. And we find, that however their rods were turned into serpents, water into blood, and frogs brought upon the land by them, they were never able to counteract one miracle of Moses, nor guard against its effect. Though they turned water into blood, they could not restore the Nile to its natural state when it was converted into blood by the rod of Moses. They brought up frogs upon the land of Egypt; but they could not free their country from the swarms of those animals which the judgment of God sent on it. If they attempted these things, the issue was unfortunate; for the putrefaction of the river continued seven days, and was at last withdrawn by God, when it produced no good effect on obdurate Pharaoh. Nor was their help of any more avail in the judgment of the frogs. They removed them not—they continued to the great annoyance of Pharaoh and his people, till Moses and Aaron were requested to remove them. They could promise with confidence, because they knew that God could with certainty perform. Glory over me, said Moses—command me; appoint the time when the frogs shall depart from thee. Pharaoh appointed the next day; and at the prayer of Moses the frogs died.

2. The other question which ought to be resolved is, when the rods of the magicians were turned into serpents, was it a real and true miracle, or the effect of sorcery and magic?

Some have supposed, that this was all mere juggling, or deception of the sight, a making that to appear which was not. But why then should not the conversion of Aaron's rod into a serpent be mere juggling also? No difference is noted between the conversion of Aaron's rod into a serpent and those of the magicians.

Others have supposed that the magicians artfully conveyed real serpents before the company, and as artfully conveyed their rods out of sight. This differs not much from juggling, and may be equally supposed of Aaron as of the magicians. Besides, had the magicians acted by legerdemain and crafty tricks, they would have run great risk of detection by Moses and Aaron, who were not deficient in natural sagacity, and one of them well instructed in all the learning of the Egyptians, and then acting by commission from God, and under his immediate direction.

Some again have supposed that the rods of the magicians were converted into serpents by the power of the devil, to take off the attention of Pharaoh from the miracle which had been wrought on Aaron's rod. This supposition seems rather to shift, than to solve the difficulty. As a created being, the devil can have no greater powers than are given to him by God, nor use them further than God shall permit: and I know of no instance where he hath been permitted to work miracles in opposition to the miracles performed by the messengers of God, in obedience to his command.

To change a rod, or staff of wood, into a serpent by any means, particularly by only casting it on the ground, is not only above all natural causes and powers, but absolutely against them. No power but that which is superior to nature can be sufficient for this purpose. The power of him who is the author of nature; who made nature to be what it is; who made all things, and gave to every thing its peculiar properties; who sustains and directs every thing according to his pleasure, is alone able to change the properties of things as he sees best, and to make a rod of wood to become a living serpent. The being whose power this is, is God—the Creator, Preserver, and Governor of all things. When, therefore, a staff cast from the hand on the ground, to gain credit to a message delivered in the name of God, becomes a serpent, the power of God is there shown, and shown for the express purpose of giving credit to his messenger, and establishing the authority of the commission by which he acts.

How, then, it may be asked, came the rods of the magicians to be turned into serpents? Was that too by the power of God? and to gain credit to Moses and Aaron as the messengers of God? I answer, I believe so. I know of no power able to turn a lifeless stick into an animated serpent, but the power of God. I cannot perceive the least intimation given in the history of the transaction, that the rods of the magicians were turned into serpents by a power different from that by which Aaron's rod was changed. Whether the miracle was properly conducted to authenticate the validity of the commission by which Moses and Aaron acted, and to influence Pharaoh to comply with their requisition, must be determined upon the due consideration of the whole transaction.

The king of Egypt was not the only person in fault with regard to the Israelites. The whole country seems to have been infected with the same proud, oppressive, and covetous temper with himself, and as unwilling to part with their labour and service as he was. Pharaoh and his court knew that Moses demanded the release of the Israelites in the name of God, as his servants by a just right, and much prior to that by which he held them in bondage. To convince Pharaoh and his servants that the God of Israel was the God of the universe, supreme over all nature, and that they were really commissioned by him, and acted in his name, and by his authority, in demanding the release of the Israelites, Aaron cast the rod that was in his hand on the ground, expressly that it might become a serpent; and the event was, it did become a serpent. Had Pharaoh and his servants conducted themselves as reasonable men, they would have concluded that Moses acted really and truly by authority from the God of Israel; and that the God of Israel was God most high, supreme over the world and all the powers of nature—that he commanded every thing, and would make it just what he pleased. To this God they ought to have submitted, seeing he was God Almighty, the Creator and Governor of the universe; for no other could do as he did.

The test of their obedience was the dismissal of the Israelites from their slavery; but this they declined. They thought their labour essential, at least highly conducive to the prosperity of the kingdom. They supposed they held them by a just title, the conquest of the country. They and their predecessors had long enjoyed the benefit of their labour: Why then give them up at a word? Some expedient must, however, be thought of, to take off the influence of the miracle which had been wrought, and to justify Pharaoh in retaining the Israelites whose dismissal had been so evidently demanded in the name of God most high. Whether Pharaoh thought that Moses wrought his miracle by an intimate knowledge of the powers of nature, and that persons of equal knowledge in the depths of science would be able to perform the same miracles which he did, or, at least, those that were equal to them; or whether he only proposed to excite an emulation between Moses and Aaron on the part of the God of Israel; and the wise men and forcerers of Egypt, on the part of natural knowledge and magic, or on the behalf of the gods of Egypt; his calling in the forcerers and magicians to enter into competition with Moses was absurd. Sufficient evidence, that Moses acted by a divine commission from God, the supreme governor of the world, had been laid before him, and he ought to have been convinced by it. To suppose that a rod could be turned into a serpent by knowledge in the powers of nature, or by the gods of Egypt, was ridiculous, and ought never to have entered the head of a reasonable man. Why then excite a competition between Moses and his wise men to determine a point which ought to have been considered as determined already? But Pharaoh set himself to keep the Israelites in his service, and therefore hardened his heart against the miracle that had been wrought for his conviction. It was, however, necessary that he should preserve the appearance of a consistent and candid conduct, that his people might be satisfied, and acquiesce in what he did

No method was more likely to answer this purpose, than a trial of skill between Moses and the wise men of Egypt, who could acquit themselves best in miraculous feats. Perplexity and confusion at least would ensue, and few would know what to believe.

What we are to understand by wise men, and sorcerers and magicians; whether they denoted three distinct orders of men, or were only different appellations of the same order; what their real characters and occupations were, and what their pretensions, it is impossible for us to know. Sorcerers and magicians are words generally used to denote bad characters—people who employ conjurations and enchantments by compact with evil spirits. Or, if we divest the word of all ill meaning, and suppose them only to mean astronomers and natural philosophers, who, through their knowledge of the powers and operations of nature, did do many things above the comprehension of the people, which were by them imagined to be produced by supernatural assistance; in either case, they must have known, that, with all their art and knowledge, and with the assistance of evil spirits into the bargain, they could not change a rod of wood into a living serpent. The attempt was base and dishonest: and competitions with Almighty God—a pretending to do as great miracles as he did, was profane and wicked.

The best apology that can be made for them is, that they were under the command of an absolute and proud king, and were probably more anxious to conciliate his favour, than to approve themselves honest and upright men. Besides, they may have quieted any scruples or repugnancy in themselves, by the opinion that there could be no harm in carrying a rod and throwing it down before Pharaoh, whatever may have been his intention in their doing so. They did so at the king's command; and the same thing happened to their rods which had happened to Aaron's—they became serpents. God met them in the way in which they perversely chose to go. Pharaoh had obstinately barred his mind against all impressions from the miracle which God had caused to be wrought for his conviction. The magicians, to say no worse of them, seem to have acted without principle, and in a way which directly tends to confound all distinction between right and wrong, truth and falsehood. God saw best to permit their ill designs to succeed in the issue of the miracle which the magicians could have had no thought of performing.

It, however, answered Pharaoh's purpose. The magicians had wrought as great, nay, the same miracle that Moses had done. Why then should he believe that Moses acted by divine commission more than the magicians? The whole transaction, therefore, instead of mollifying Pharaoh's temper, and convincing him of the power of the God of Israel, hardened his heart; that is, it increased his obstinacy, and confirmed his resolution not to dismiss the Israelites from his service.

To a more reasonable man, there are two considerations which would probably have presented themselves on this occasion. One is, that however the same miracle was wrought on their rods, which was wrought on the rod of Aaron, there was yet this difference; that, in the latter case, it was wrought expressly to prove the reality of a divine commission, by authority of which, Moses demanded the dismissal of the Israelites. But the magicians pretended no divine commission, but attempted the miracle without any object in view, except to baffle Moses and Aaron, and take off the influence of the miracle they had wrought to gain credit to the commission under which they acted, and to obtain Pharaoh's compliance with their demand, by convincing him, that the God by whose authority they acted, was superior to all the powers of nature, and indeed almighty. That two of these magicians, Jannes and Jambres, withstood Moses, and resisted the truth, we learn from St. Paul (2 Tim. iii. 8.) and Bishop Patrick informs us, "that it was a common thing in ancient times, for such kind of men (magicians) to contend one with another." Probably, therefore, the magicians entered into this opposition with Moses, merely with a view to the trial of their abilities in performing feats of wonder; without any regard to consequences further than victory was concerned.

The other consideration that ought to have been attended to by Pharaoh was, that the serpent into which Aaron's rod was turned, swallowed up the serpents from the rods of the magicians. This was not only an astonishing circumstance in itself, but ought to have convinced all who knew it, of the superiority of the power by which Moses acted, over the power and art of the magicians.

From this consideration, let us learn the danger those people run, who, from corrupt hearts and wicked purposes, reject such evidences of the truth as are sufficient for the conviction of reasonable men. God hath established the christian religion, among other things, by the authority of miracles. The evidence that such miracles were wrought, is contained in the historical books of the New Testament. The authenticity and credit of those books are as well ascertained, as the authority and credit of any old books can be. If we reject them, we must reject all writings of equal antiquity, and what is worse, we reject the authority of God, and expose ourselves to his judgment, which commonly shows itself in what is called blindness of heart and mind; that is, in an incapacity of accurately distinguishing truth from falsehood in other matters: And, indeed, people of observation will perceive that most of those who reject the evidences of christianity, are as easily imposed upon by romantic stories and improbable fictions as any people in the world—are more superstitious, and believe on less evidence, when religion is out of the way, than any other people will do. For the resisting of reasonable evidence in one case, blinds the mind and perverts the judgment, so that they cannot perceive what is reasonable evidence in other cases. Pharaoh would not be convinced by the miracle of Moses' rod being turned into a serpent, that Moses acted by divine authority: And yet he was convinced from the rods of the magicians being turned into serpents, that Moses did not act by divine authority. So stupid is incredulity when exerted against the belief of that evidence by which God makes known his power and wisdom in the world.

DISCOURSE I.

PART THE THIRD.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE HISTORY OF PHARAOH.

IMMEDIATELY after the recital of the miracle of Aaron's rod being turned into a serpent, it is remarked, "The Lord said unto Moses, Pharaoh's heart is hardened; he refuseth to let the people go." The miracle intended for his conviction had a contrary effect, and made him more obstinate in his resolution to keep the Israelites in servitude. God, therefore, commanded Moses to meet him, the next morning, at the river, whither he intended to go, either for the sake of bathing, or to pay his adoration; that river being esteemed one of the principal deities of Egypt. The business of Moses was again to demand the dismissal of the Israelites, that they might worship God in the wilderness. He was also to declare to Pharaoh, that, unless he consented, he would smite the river with his rod, and all the waters of Egypt should become blood. Moses did as he was commanded; and upon Aaron's striking the river with the rod, it, and all the rivers, and pools, and ponds of water in Egypt, became blood, and stank, and the fish died. Distressed with drought, the Egyptians digged near the river for water to drink.

This miracle had as little influence on Pharaoh as the former one; for "the magicians of Egypt did so with their enchantments;" that is, they also turned water into blood; "and Pharaoh's heart was hardened; neither did he hearken unto" Moses and Aaron, as the Lord had said, but "turned and went into his house; neither did he set his heart to this also." He became more obstinate and fullen; would give himself no trouble to consider the matter, but let it pass, without even reflecting, that though the magicians had imitated the miracle of Moses, yet, by turning water into blood, they had increased and not alleviated the distress of the Egyptians.

There is an intimation in the last verse of the seventh chapter of Exodus, that the effect of this miracle continued seven days. It seems then to have been withdrawn by the goodness of God, unsolicited by Pharaoh or any one for him. To punish with reluctance, is the character which the inspired writers give us of almighty God. He is slow to anger, and doth not willingly afflict the children of men. For this reason it is that God, except in the case where utter excision is intended, not only withdraws his judgments upon repentance, but also when he sees that no repentance will be produced by them. When judgments are designed to correct and amend, if they fail of this end, why should they be continued? To punish for the sake of punishment is no property of God. “Why should you be stricken any more?” said he, by Isaiah, to his old people; “ye will revolt more and more.” So totally were they corrupted, that there was no prospect of their amendment, even by the judgments of God.

Suppose the judgment inflicted by the miracle which turned the waters of Egypt into blood, to be intended for the conviction and amendment of Pharaoh, and every thing that relates to it will be easily understood. Seven days trial was enough to convince the kingdom of Egypt, that the miracle had been wrought. They saw the waters of Egypt to be only blood, and they saw that their king would not be induced by the distress which lay on his kingdom, or which he personally endured, to submit to the God of Israel. Why continue the distress which produced no further good effect? The power of God had been displayed; his superiority over the Nile, the source of fertility to Egypt, and which the Egyptians considered and adored as a deity, had been made manifest to the whole country. No good effect was likely to be produced on Pharaoh, and God, in mercy, removed the distress from the suffering Egyptians; all of whom cannot be supposed to have been equally criminal with their obstinate king.

God sent Moses again to Pharaoh to demand the dismissal of his people, and to inform him that if he refused, the frogs should come up from the river in such abundance, that they should force their way into the houses and ovens, and kneading-troughs of his servants, into his own bed-chamber, and into his very bed. The notice producing no effect, Aaron stretched out his hand with the rod in it, over the waters of Egypt; “and the frogs came up, and covered the land of Egypt.” “And the magicians did so with their enchantments, and brought up frogs upon the land of Egypt.”

It has been noted, that though the rods of the magicians were turned into serpents, as well as the rod of Aaron, they could not defend their rods from being devoured by his rod. Again, they succeeded in turning water into blood; but they had not power to heal the waters of Egypt, and make them wholesome and fit to drink. So here, in the plague of frogs, though they succeeded in producing those animals, they had no power to drive them away, or destroy them. Why else did Pharaoh apply to Moses and Aaron, to intreat the Lord that he would take away the frogs from him and his people, enforcing his request with an explicit promise that he would then “let the people go, that they might do sacrifice unto the Lord?” This promise he ought faithfully to have kept, as well on other accounts, as that it was the express condition of his deliverance from great distress, not only to himself, but to his whole kingdom. From his magicians he could obtain no relief. To the intercession of Moses he looked for that blessing; and he ought to have considered, that the God who could inflict and remove the plagues, must be the God of heaven, whom all things obey; and to have submitted to him, and obeyed his command.

The reply of Moses when Pharaoh requested his mediation, was, "Glory over me"—command me. When shall the frogs depart, and remain in the river only? Name your own time. Nothing could be fairer in itself, or have a more direct tendency to lead Pharaoh to consider the power and goodness of God, than this submission of Moses, referring the time of Pharaoh's relief to his own determination. He replied, "To-morrow." Accordingly Moses intreated the Lord, and on the morrow the frogs died. "But when Pharaoh saw that there was respite," he forgot his promise; "he hardened his heart, and hearkened not unto them, as the Lord had said."

Without sending any message to Pharaoh, God now commanded Moses to direct Aaron to "stretch out his rod and smite the dust of the land, that it might become lice through all the land of Egypt." He did so, and the dust "became lice, in man and in beast, all the dust of the land became lice through all the land of Egypt. And the magicians did so with their enchantments to bring forth lice, but they could not." By their failure God showed that the miracles they had wrought were not performed by their own power and art, but by his hand, and to answer his purposes. Of this the magicians seem, in some degree, to have been sensible: for of this miracle they acknowledged to Pharaoh, "This is the finger of God." No effect, however, had it on Pharaoh, but still further to harden his heart; “and he hearkened not unto them, as the Lord had said.”

Behold the progress of obstinacy in this man! The miracles performed by the magicians seem to have been the reason why he was not convinced by the miracles of Moses. Yet the magicians only repeated, they could not counteract what Moses had done, nor rescue Egypt from the heavy judgments which, by his ministry, were inflicted on it. But here was a miracle which they could not repeat or imitate—which they confessed was done by the power of God most high. Yet on Pharaoh it had no effect. He had already resisted more evidence than a reasonable man would require. He had broken his word with Moses when, under the plague of frogs, he promised to let the people go, and do sacrifice unto the Lord. Having thus depraved his judgment by resisting clear, and full, and strong evidence; having forfeited his honour, by breaking his word pledged to Moses, and in a matter in which God was concerned; it was not hard for him to go further in the road of obstinacy, and to resist the force of this miracle also, though in the opinion of his own magicians it was done by the power of God omnipotent.

Thus were matters circumstanced, when God commanded Moses to stand in Pharaoh’s way as he went to the river early in the morning, and to say unto him, “Thus saith the Lord, let my people go, that they may serve me. Else, if thou wilt not let my people go, behold, I will send swarms of flies," or of noxious venomous insects, "upon thee and upon thy servants, and upon thy people, and into thy houses: And the houses of the Egyptians shall be full of swarms of flies, and also the ground on which they go—to-morrow shall this sign be." At the same time, God declared that he would protect the land of Goshen, in which his people dwelt, so that no swarms of flies should be there—"To the end," said God to Pharaoh, "thou mayest know, that I am the Lord in the midst of the earth." When it is considered that, in most languages, the word which signifies the earth, is frequently restrained to signify a particular country, especially that country of which the discourse treats, there will remain but little doubt, that the meaning of the expression, I am the Lord in the midst of the earth, is, that God was the Lord, the supreme king and governor of Egypt; and by the division which he would put between the Israelites and Egyptians, he would manifest himself to be so—the great, the almighty disposer of judgments and blessings through the land.

According to the word of Moses, when the morrow came, there came with it "a greivous swarm of flies into the house of Pharaoh, and into his servants' houses, and into all the land of Egypt: The land was corrupted by reason of the swarm of flies."

In great distress, Pharaoh sent and called Moses and Aaron, and said to them, "Go ye, sacrifice to your God in the land." But however he may have been affected by this plague; however his heart may have relented under the chastisement of those venomous insects, his offer of indulgence to the Israelites to sacrifice to God in the land of Egypt, was far short of the demand which God had made. It was a compromise which Moses had no right to accept. He, therefore, replied, that it would be improper to accept this offer, because they must sacrifice "the abomination of the Egyptians to the Lord their God"—that is, bullocks, and sheep, and goats, which the Egyptians esteemed as sacred animals. Continuing his plea, he alleged, that should they do so, the Egyptians would, in all probability, resent it so highly, as to assault and stone them. He, therefore, insisted on his first demand—leave to go three days journey into the wilderness, that, being out of the observation of the Egyptians, they might, without danger of increasing their resentment, sacrifice to the Lord in such manner as he should command them.

To this remonstrance Pharaoh then consented, and said, "I will let you go, that you may sacrifice to the Lord your God, in the wilderness; only you shall not go very far away; and added, as it were in the same breath, intreat for me. Moses replied, that he would intreat the Lord that the swarms of noisome flies which filled the country, might depart from Pharaoh and from his servants, and that on the very next day. At the same time he cautioned Pharaoh, who had once failed of fulfilling his promise to him, "not to deal deceitfully any more in not letting the people go to sacrifice to the Lord."

When Moses withdrew, he intreated the Lord; and the Lord did according to the prayer of Moses: He removed the swarms of flies so entirely, that there remained not one. But behold the ingratitude and duplicity of Pharaoh! When delivered from the torment of the flies, instead of regarding his promise, he “hardened his heart at this time also, neither would he let the people go.” To such meanness does the persisting in a wicked purpose drive infatuated men. The proud and covetous are the most apt to fall into it. Pride prevents amendment, by representing a change of conduct to be a confession of having acted wrong: and covetousness cannot bear to relinquish any point from which gain is expected. These seem to have been the leading properties of Pharaoh’s heart, and they conspired to sink him into that fatal obstinacy and wretched meanness which ended in his destruction.

Notwithstanding the baseness of Pharaoh’s conduct, God sent Moses to him again with the same requisition to let his people go, made in the name of the Lord God of the Hebrews. If he refused to comply, Moses was to denounce a very grievous murrain on the next day, which should be fatal to the cattle of the field; to the horses, and asses, and camels, and oxen, and sheep. At the same time, he was to inform Pharaoh, that the cattle of the Israelites should be entirely and absolutely exempt from that calamity.

The fatal day came, and the destructive murrain came with it. The cattle of the Egyptians died in great numbers, but of the cattle of the Israelites not one. Of this latter circumstance Pharaoh sent particularly to inquire, and found it strictly true. This distinguishing mark of God's favour, however, opened not his eyes; nor did the consideration which it was obvious to make, that no relief was to be had from the gods of Egypt whom they worshipped (seeing their sacred animals, equally with their other cattle, were victims to the fatal murrain) abate the pride and obstinacy of his temper, but increased them both—"his heart was hardened, and he did not let the people go."

Without directing Moses to apply again unto Pharaoh, God commanded to "take handfuls of ashes, and to sprinkle it towards the heaven in the sight of Pharaoh; and it shall become," said God, "small dust in all the land of Egypt, and shall be a bile breaking forth with blains upon man, and upon beast, throughout all the land of Egypt." Moses did as he was commanded, and the ashes which he threw up toward heaven infected the air, produced biles with inflammation, upon man, and upon beast. Nor were the magicians exempt. Smitten with the bile, they no longer contended with Moses, but retired from his presence.

Of the magicians we have nothing since their failure in the miracle of the lice. Probably they had attended on all the actions of Moses, but without any further attempt to imitate his miracles. Probably, too, they had been Pharaoh's principal advisers, and had dictated to him that conduct, which he had so fatally pursued. What now happened to them ought to have convinced them and Pharaoh, and all his courtiers and people, that God, in whose name Moses acted, was, in truth, the God of heaven and earth, almighty, supreme over all nature, from whose power nothing was exempt, to whose judgments all wicked, impenitent men were subjected, and whose blessings no strength or influence was able to turn aside from his chosen objects. Duty, reason, common sense and prudence, therefore, required them to submit to this God, and obey his will; particularly to let the Israelites go from their servitude, as he had commanded Pharaoh to do.

In this case, no reasonable excuse could be made, no apology for their conduct could be offered. They had seen the most stupendous miracles wrought by Moses at the command of God, to establish the authenticity of his commission, and to chastise Pharaoh, and his courtiers, and people, for their obstinacy and incredulity. Yet they believed not, nor submitted themselves to the will of this God; but stubbornly determined to keep the Israelites in their service, notwithstanding all he could do to them.

Personal chastisement for their flagitious conduct, the magicians seem hitherto to have escaped. It now came on them in common with the men and brutes of Egypt. Equally hardened with their master, and having, probably, been the principal means of hardening him, deservedly did they partake in his punishment.

At the close of the account of this judgment, it is said, "And the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh, and he hearkened not unto them; as the Lord had spoken unto Moses." The reference from this latter expression is, in the margin of our Bible, made to that text, where God threatens to harden Pharaoh's heart, if he attended not to the miracles which Moses was to do before him. Pharaoh's obstinate resistance against the other miracles, is expressed by his hardening his heart, or by his heart's being hardened. The two phrases mean the same thing; for Bishop Patrick hath remarked, that the words for both are in the Hebrew text the same. There is, therefore, no good ground for the rendering of chap. vii. 13. which our translators have given, he hardened Pharaoh's heart: no person is named, but only the fact asserted, that Pharaoh's heart was hardened. In this sense, the LXX have rendered this verse, κατ'εχυσεν ἡ καρδια Φαραω. In this sense God explains himself to Moses in the next verse, "Pharaoh's heart is hardened"—βεβαρηται ἡ καρδια Φαραω—Pharaoh's heart is stout, is obstinate. The state of his heart is declared, but no agent is pointed out.

But in chap. ix. 12. the act of hardening Pharaoh's heart is ascribed immediately to God. The question then will be, In what way, or rather in what sense, did God harden Pharaoh's heart? Certainly not by infusing positive hardness and obstinacy into it. That would have been counter-acting, by his almighty power, those miracles, which his goodness had directed his servant Moses to perform for Pharaoh's conviction.

The tenor of God's conduct toward Pharaoh shows that he treated him as a free agent, endowed with reason, and having a will of his own, and a capacity of determining that will; either to let the Israelites depart from his country at the requisition of God, or to endeavour to retain them in his service. God determined to treat him accordingly—to give him ample and sufficient motives and arguments to convince his reason and judgment, that he who demanded the Israelites of him, was indeed God almighty, the Lord of heaven and earth, and of all things in them. If he complied, all was well: if he refused, the judgments of God were to fall upon him.

God, who knew his proud, and obstinate, and covetous temper, knew the conduct he would pursue; and, therefore, told Moses, he would not let the people go, without a mighty hand. For which reason, said God, “I will stretch out my hand, and smite Egypt with all my wonders which I will do in the midst thereof; and after that he will let you go.” Exod. iii. 19, 20. Take this with you as a key, and the whole history is intelligible and plain; but, on other ground, it is inconsistent with the nature of God, and not to be understood. For, in fact, Pharaoh did, at last, consent that the Israelites should go, from among his people, according to the utmost meaning of the requisition of God by Moses—go even where they listed, and take their families, and their flocks and herds with them, and sacrifice to the Lord as they had desired—requesting, at the same time, their blessing on him. Had God hardened Pharaoh’s heart, by infusing obstinacy and stubbornness into it, is it possible Pharaoh could have acted in this manner? for who, in this sense, can resist the will, or controul the decrees of God?

The sum of the matter seems to be this: The time was come, to fulfil the promise made to Abraham; to bring his posterity out of the land in which they were strangers and servants; to judge, that is, to punish that nation who had held them in bondage, and to give them the land of the Canaanites, whose iniquity was now ripe for the vengeance of God: he, therefore, determined to accomplish his promise. All things are in his hand; and any means he shall use most effectually answer his purpose. He could have sent the Ethiopians, or the Phenician shepherds to have overrun Egypt a second time, and have delivered his people by their means. Any nation, supported by his power, would have reduced Egypt to submission, as the Persians, Assyrians, and Romans afterwards did. There went out from Egypt six hundred thousand of the Israelites that were men. And, when numbered, two years after, they amounted, exclusive of the tribe of Levi, to six hundred and three thousand, five hundred and fifty men, fit for war. From this multitude armies might have been formed capable, at least, of forcing their way out of Egypt, had God seen proper to make use of force, or, indeed, of any human means for the deliverance of his people. But he chose, in this matter, to act conspicuously by himself, that he might convince not only the Egyptians, but the Israelites—all who should hear of his wonders in Egypt, that he alone is God, the Creator, Preserver, and Governor of all things; the only object of the worship and adoration of men; the Almighty, who can do what he pleases in heaven and in earth; that he needed not the force of armies to accomplish his purposes, all the elements of the world, all the powers of nature being at his command; that he could make the most insignificant things in the creation, frogs, flies, lice, dust, the instruments of his vengeance on a proud oppressor, who deliberately resisted his will. He knew, for he knoweth all things, the obstinate and stubborn temper of Pharaoh: that he would not, without great reluctance, part with the Israelites, from whose servitude he acquired both dignity and profit. He knew the perverse, sullen, and humorfome disposition of the Israelites; that if their own efforts were employed for their deliverance, they would ascribe the whole success of it to themselves, and swell with vain-glory, and confidence in their own arm and military prowess.

The wisdom of God saw best to proceed in a manner that should open a way for the manifestation of his power, and majesty, and goodness, not only to the Egyptians and Israelites, but to the whole world. To humble the stubborn heart of obstinate Pharaoh, and oblige him, how much soever against his will, not only to consent to the departure of the Israelites, but to send them out of the country by his own order; and to induce the Egyptians to hire them to hasten their departure, by lending, or rather giving them such things as they required, gold, and silver, and jewels, and clothing: And that the Israelites, observing that no exertions of their own were required, no war, no fighting, no plots or stratagems, but only to “stand still and see the salvation of God,” might be the better disposed to ascribe the whole glory of their deliverance to his power and goodness, and the more readily yield their faith, and hope, and obedience to him. Besides,

The wonders wrought in Egypt would be made known to all the nations with whom the Egyptians had any intercourse, and the fear and dread of the God of Israel would be the necessary consequence. The more Pharaoh struggled against the power of God, the more would that power be displayed in his humiliation and destruction: and the greater the difficulties were which attended the deliverance of Israel, the more glorious would that deliverance be in itself, and the more astonishing to all who heard of it; nor could it fail to impress them with the opinion that the God of Israel was the God and Governor of all things, to whom all the elements of the world, and all the powers of nature, were subject; and whose will it was both their interest and duty to obey.

That the obstinacy of the king of Egypt might not discourage Moses, and make him desist from his attempt to deliver his nation, God warned him of that obstinacy, and told him that Pharaoh would not let the people depart from his service, but with a mighty hand; that is, under the infliction of great judgments; yet at the last he would let them go. Accordingly, every message which Moses carried from God to Pharaoh was precisely the same, without augmentation or diminution, "Let my people go, that they may serve me." If Pharaoh refused, some judgment, which was particularly specified, and the time fixed, was to come on him and his people; if he complied, no judgment was to follow. So that Pharaoh's disobeying, or obeying the requisition of God, was to be treated in a very different manner. In the former case, he became the object of God's justice; in the latter, of his mercy.

What then, it may be asked, are we to understand by God's hardening Pharaoh's heart? I answer, the same that we are to understand by his hardening the heart of any other wicked person. He dealt with Pharaoh by the same rule by which he deals with all others—the rule of justice and mercy—mercy where it can be shown, justice where perversity of conduct has excluded mercy.

It is a common observation, that repeated sinning seareth the conscience; that is, it hardeneth the heart. So that by habit a man may come to commit sins without reluctance, or check of conscience, or any apprehension of the displeasure of God, which, at first, made him shudder and tremble. Those checks of conscience, which were at first very uneasy to him, gradually lose their force, and, at length, give no trouble. In truth, he feels them not; his heart is hardened, and he no longer cares or thinks what God hath commanded or forbidden.

Some things, we know, are softened and melted, while other things are hardened by the fire. Is the nature of the fire different? or is it the different nature of the substances applied to it, that occasions the different effects?

When a person hath long continued in a course of sin, hath perpetually disobeyed the known will of God, hath resisted the dispensation of his providence, the admonitions of his conscience, the influence of divine grace, the inspirations of the Holy Spirit, and all the means of repentance and holiness, so that they have no longer any effect upon him, is there any impropriety in saying that God hath hardened his heart; though the means by which it is hardened, be the very means which God hath appointed to render it soft, and pliable, and obedient to his heavenly will? When the abandoned sinner hath brought himself into this wretched state, where is the injustice, should God withdraw his holy spirit from him, and leave him to follow his own vile imagination—to that reprobate mind which works all iniquity with greediness? Whether God withdraws his grace from him, because he will make no use of it; or whether he hath so hardened his heart, by repeatedly resisting and acting contrary to the impressions of goodness made on him by the spirit of God, it comes to the same thing; and what is said of the one, may just as well be said of the other state. If God take his grace and holy spirit from him, his heart will be hardened, and God may be said to harden it; not indeed by infusing obstinacy into him, but because he would make no use of that grace and those inspirations of the spirit which were intended to render him capable of that obedience to his will which God requires.

All the miracles wrought by Moses, which are sometimes called signs, were wrought for the conviction of Pharaoh—to be signs to him, that the Lord God of the Hebrews, who demanded the Israelites of him, was God Almighty. Being wrought by his command, there is no impropriety in saying he wrought them. But, instead of convincing Pharaoh, they unhappily proved the occasion of increasing his obstinacy. For, whenever they were removed, and he saw there was respite, he hardened his heart. God is, therefore, said to harden his heart, because what he did for his conviction produced that effect.

This is the most that can be made of that expression, consistently with the nature of God and the nature of man. And it ought to convince us of the necessity of conforming ourselves to the will of God, and, on all occasions, doing what he commands; lest, by perpetually resisting his will, and the evidences of it which he lays before us, we harden ourselves in iniquity, provoke him to anger, and bring his judgments on us.

DISCOURSE I.

PART THE FOURTH.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE HISTORY OF PHARAOH.

WE have seen, that when Moses, at the command of God, sprinkled ashes towards heaven, it became a bile, with inflammation, upon man and beast, throughout the land of Egypt. So long, and so repeatedly had Pharaoh hardened himself against the miraculous evidence which God gave him that Moses was indeed sent to demand the dismissal of the Israelites from his service, that it was no trouble to him to resist the force of this miracle also. God is, therefore, said to harden his heart, because the means which God used for his conviction, only made him more obstinate in his perverseness and impiety. For which reason God seems, at this time, to have given him up to his own reprobate mind, and to have passed the sentence of destruction upon him. But let us attend to his history, and take the circumstances as they rise there.

Notwithstanding the obstinate behaviour of Pharaoh under the judgment of the bites, and that it was said, God had hardened his heart, Moses was sent again to him, to repeat his original demand—“ Thus saith the Lord of the Hebrews, let my people go, that they may serve me. For I will, at this time, send all my plagues upon thine heart, and upon thy servants, and upon thy people, that thou mayest know that there is none like me in all the earth. For now I will stretch out my hand, that I may smite thee and thy people with pestilence; and thou shalt be cut off from the earth. And, in very deed, for this cause have I raised thee up, for to show in thee my power; and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth.”

It may be necessary here to resolve, if we can, a difficulty which arises, and which, I trust, is fully expressed in the following question: Why was Moses sent again to Pharaoh, after God had hardened his heart; that is, had withdrawn his grace and holy spirit from him, had blinded his reason and understanding, so that it was impossible he should obey?

To this it has been thought sufficient to reply, that God dealt with Pharaoh, as Pharaoh dealt with the Israelites. He demanded of them brick without straw; and God demanded of him obedience, when he was rendered incapable of paying it. To dissent from the opinions of great and good men is painful. But when it is considered, that Pharaoh's demand of the same tale of bricks from the Israelites, after the straw was withheld, which they used to deliver in when they were furnished with straw, was unjust and cruel, I cannot persuade myself that God would imitate that conduct even towards Pharaoh. Goodness and mercy are the rule of all his actions, and nothing inconsistent with them ought to be ascribed to him. Besides; to say that Pharaoh could not consent to the departure of the Israelites, because God had hardened his heart, or had entirely withdrawn his holy spirit from him, is more than we have a right to say. The demand and expostulation of Moses suppose that he could have consented; and, without that supposition, they are irreconcilable to common sense. The fact, too, supports this supposition; for, at the last, he did let the people go, and requested their blessing, which, at least, must mean their prayers to God for him.

Whatever, therefore, may be the meaning of God's hardening the heart of Pharaoh, it cannot imply his infusing hardness of heart into Pharaoh, or taking his grace and holy spirit from him, so that he might not, or could not obey. These suppositions seem to be the sprouts of Calvinism, or of that fancied decree of reprobation, passed, from eternity, against a part of mankind, in order to make the justice of God the more conspicuous to the world, in the punishment of their wickedness; as if there would be no room for the justice of God, without that abominable decree of reprobation. Justice consists in treating things according to truth, not in making men bad, for the sake of inflicting punishment upon them. God is ever represented, in his holy word, as being solicitous, through goodness and mercy, to save men from destruction, but never as being impatient and hasty to punish, even the most abandoned sinner. No impediments will, therefore, be laid by him in the way of any man's obedience; nor grace and strength refused sufficient to enable him to do his duty.

There is another position alleged to justify the conduct of God in demanding the dismissal of the Israelites, after he had hardened Pharaoh's heart, so that he could not obey him; namely, that God is not deprived of his right to obedience by any incapacity a man brings on himself. But this is shifting the ground, and supposes Pharaoh's incapacity of obeying God to have arisen from himself, and not from God's hardening his heart. On this ground, however, I suspect, the position will not bear examination. Hath a master a right to demand the same obedience from his servant, after the servant hath carelessly or wilfully befuddled his mind and understanding, or disabled a hand or a foot, so that he cannot fulfil his master's commands? And shall we account for God's conduct on principles which would be a reproach to a good man? Of God's requiring obedience from any man above his capacity, taking into the account the assistance and ability he is ready to give, no instance can be named: A remarkable one to the contrary is ready to our hand. When Adam fell, he weakened and depraved his nature, and deprived it of the holy spirit. Did God continue to require the same obedience of him which, in his innocence, he was able to perform? or did he put him under a new covenant, or rule of life, through the Redeemer, and accept his repentance and faith instead of obedience which was without sin?

God is said to do things immediately by himself, when natural means apparently produce the effect. He replenisheth the earth, and maketh it fruitful; yet the sun, and air, and rain, the labour and tillage of man, are necessary to this end. All these God hath provided and appointed, and by his direction they conspire to produce the effect. Through all nature, the primary cause of every thing that happens is in him by whom all nature exists and acts. In him we live and move. The energy by which we think and act is from him; but the perversity of our thoughts and actions is from perverting the powers he hath given to us.

God's hardening Pharaoh's heart, therefore, cannot mean his infusing any bad quality into him, but that Pharaoh previously converted all the means of conviction—all the miracles and judgments of God, into occasions of obstinacy and hardness of heart, till he rendered himself insensible of the motions of the spirit of God in him. That was his reprobation, and made him ripe for destruction. And the purport of the remonstrance of Moses was to acquaint him, that God had preserved him, and hitherto kept him alive, not for his own sake, but for the sake of others—not that there was any hopes of his amendment—but to convince him, by awful and certain judgments, that there was none like God in all the earth. And also, that by cutting him off in some remarkable manner, he might make him such an instance of his power as should declare his name throughout all the world.

To give this remonstrance the more effect, Moses warned him, that if he still exalted himself, and would not let the people go, God would, on the very next day, at that time of it, “cause it to rain a very grievous hail,” such as before had never happened in Egypt. To this declaration a kind admonition from the goodness of God was added; namely, to bring all the cattle that were left of the murrain out of the field, and to shelter them, and also their servants, from the storm. Those Egyptians who believed Moses, and for whose sakes, probably, this caution had been given, did as they were directed; and, securing their servants and cattle under cover, preserved them. Others, who disregarded the admonition, left their cattle and servants abroad, and destruction overtook them: for at the time appointed on the morrow, Moses, at the command of God, stretched forth his rod toward heaven, and the storm came; rain, and hail, and lightning, and thunder, dreadfully mixed together, and poured with terrible impetuosity on the ground; very grievous, such as before had never been seen in Egypt. The men and cattle that were in the field were killed; the trees were broken, and all the produce of the earth that was grown up was destroyed. From this horrible calamity the land of Goshen was exempt: no hail fell there, no storm assailed it.

What makes this miracle the more extraordinary is, that little or no rain falls in Lower Egypt: the country is rendered fruitful by the Nile, which, annually overflowing its banks, fills the canals cut through the flat country, and furnishes water for the gardens and corn grounds.

During this storm, Moses and Aaron were called to Pharaoh. He seems to have been deeply affected by this tremendous storm, and to have formed good resolutions of amendment. "I have sinned," said he, "this time. The Lord is righteous, and I and my people are wicked. Intreat the Lord that there be no more mighty thunders and hail; and I will let you go, and ye shall stay no longer." Moses replied, that as soon as he had got out of the city, he would spread abroad his hands unto the Lord; "and the thunder," said he, "shall cease, neither shall there be any more hail; that thou mayest know," as well in their removal as in their infliction, "that the earth is the Lord's." But, as for thee and thy servants, I know that "ye will not yet fear the Lord God." Moses did as he had promised. He "spread abroad his hands unto the Lord; and the thunders and the hail ceased, and the rain was not poured on the earth." But behold the vanity of good resolutions formed in our own strength, of the purposes of amendment, which calamities force on us! When the storm was over, and calm and sunshine had returned, Pharaoh thought no more of his promise or good resolutions: "He sinned yet more, and hardened his heart, he and his servants; neither would he let the children of Israel go; as the Lord had spoken by Moses," and as Moses had lately predicted to Pharaoh. In chap. ix. 34. it is said, that Pharaoh "hardened his heart." In the 35th verse, it is said, "and the heart of Pharaoh was hardened." In chap. x. 1. it is recorded, that the Lord said, "I have hardened his (Pharaoh's) heart." How it may appear to others, I know not: to me it appears, that these three phrases, relating to the same event, under the same circumstances, must mean the same thing: they express the fact, that Pharaoh's heart continued hard, and obstinate, and unrelenting, when the storm of hail was over; notwithstanding the goodness of God, in warning the Egyptians to take care of their servants and cattle under the impending calamity, and in making the storm to cease at Pharaoh's request and promise of submission. Insatuated by his own headstrong will, and following the dictates of his obstinate temper, he set himself against those judgments that were intended to reclaim him, and would not permit them to have their natural influence upon him; but, sinning yet more, would not let the Israelites depart from his service.

God having informed Moses that he had hardened Pharaoh's heart, so that he should have an opportunity of showing all the signs which he intended to do before him, and the Israelites an opportunity of telling their children, through all posterity, the great things he had done for them in Egypt: that all might be convinced and know that he alone was to be adored, God sent him again to Pharaoh, to rebuke him for his pride, and to repeat his first demand. Coming with Aaron unto Pharaoh, he delivered the following message: "Thus saith the Lord God of the Hebrews, how long wilt thou refuse to humble thyself before me? Let my people go, that they may serve me."

This message was followed by a declaration of the unhappy consequence of rejecting his demand; namely, that the locusts should be in his country the next day, and in such numbers that they should cover the face of the earth; that they should force themselves into their houses, and eat up every green thing which had escaped the destruction of the hail. Having delivered his message, he waited not for an answer, but turned, and went out from Pharaoh.

In dread of the consequence of what Moses had said, the great men of Pharaoh's court interposed, and remonstrated with him. "How long shall this man be a snare unto us? Let the men go, that they may serve the Lord their God: Knowest thou not yet that Egypt is destroyed?" On this remonstrance, Moses and Aaron were called back to Pharaoh. He proposed to them, that the men of Israel, leaving their families and flocks behind them, should go and serve the Lord; pretending that to be the full import of their first demand. But when Moses insisted upon taking their families and all their cattle with them, he angrily refused—charged them with evil intentions; that is, with the design never to return; and he drove them out from his presence.

After this outrage, Moses, at the command of God, stretched forth his rod over the land of Egypt. A strong east wind followed, and blew till the next morning, when the locusts appeared, and in such numbers that they covered and darkened the country, and devoured every green thing in it.

The destruction of Egypt seems to have been nearly completed by this visitation. In haste, therefore, Pharaoh sent for Moses and Aaron, “and said, I have sinned against the Lord your God, and against you;—forgive, I pray thee, my sin only this once, and intreat the Lord your God that he may take away from me this death only.” Moses went out, and intreated the Lord; and such was his goodness upon the appearance of compunction even in Pharaoh, that he “turned a mighty strong west wind, which took away the locusts, and cast them into the Red Sea: there remained not one locust in all the coasts of Egypt.” But so great was the obstinacy of Pharaoh, and so little his respect for his own word, that he regarded not what had passed, nor the promise he had made. The history adds, “The Lord hardened his heart, so that he would not let the children of Israel go.”

Thus hardened in his opposition to the will of God, there was no prospect of doing any good to Pharaoh. To punish him and the Egyptians for their obstinacy; to deliver his own people from slavery, and thereby fulfil his promise to Abraham; to make himself known to the world as God Almighty, supreme over every thing that exists, the only object of faith, and obedience, and adoration, seems to have been the purpose of God in the latter judgments inflicted on Pharaoh. Without any further message to Pharaoh, God, therefore, commanded Moses to stretch out his hand toward heaven, that there might be thick darkness, such as might be felt throughout all the land of Egypt.

Moses did as he was commanded, and the darkness came so thick and terrible, that it confined the Egyptians to their places three days; while the children of Israel were blessed with light in Goshen. Extreme must have been their distress, since it obliged Pharaoh to call to Moses, and say, "Go ye, serve the Lord; only let your flocks and your herds be stayed; let your little ones also go with you." Moses replied, that they must have sacrifices and burnt offerings, such as God should command; their cattle, therefore, must go with them. Here the relenting of Pharaoh ended, and passion succeeded in its place. The Lord "hardened his heart, and he would not let the people go." To his refusal he added threats: "Get thee from me," said he to Moses; "take heed to thyself; see my face no more; for in that day thou seeest my face, thou shalt die."

But however peremptory his threat was, and however positive the answer of Moses, "Thou hast spoken well; I will see thy face again no more;" the next chapter informs us, that he delivered to

Pharaoh the message contained in it, (Exod. xi. 4—8.) This message consisted of a denunciation of destruction, impending on the first-born children of Egypt, to be inflicted in that very night, from the first-born of Pharaoh to the first-born of the meanest servant; and also on the first born of cattle. Moses also declared that God would put a distinction between the Israelites and the Egyptians; none of the Israelites should die; no disaster should happen to them; in their habitations all should be peace and quietness, not even a dog should move his tongue against any of them: but that in Egypt there should be a great cry and lamentation, through the bitterness of their distress; and that the servants of Pharaoh, who were then in his presence, should come down to him, and bow themselves unto him, and humbly intreat him and his people to depart out of the land—“After that,” said Moses, “I will go out: and he went out from Pharaoh in a great anger.”

This reading, in our Bible, leads us to suppose that Moses was violently angry when he left Pharaoh; looking more to the provocation he had received, than to the exceeding meekness of his temper. Good Hebrew critics, however, ascribe the anger to Pharaoh, and teach us to translate the passage, and Moses went out from Pharaoh, who was in a heat of anger.

Previously to this last interview of Moses with Pharaoh, God had, by him, commanded the Israelites to take every family of them a lamb for itself. The passover, at which the lamb was to be sacrificed, was instituted, and its intention and service were explained. Now they were ordered to kill and eat the passover, in the evening of that day in which Moses had delivered the above recited message to Pharaoh. They were also directed to mark, with a bunch of hyssop, dipped in the blood of the lamb, the two side-posts, and the lintel, or upper cross-piece of the frame of their doors, as a security against the destroying angel, who, that night, was to pass through Egypt, to destroy the first-born. When they had done so, they were to remain quietly in their houses, and not to go out from under the protection of the blood until the morning. Following these directions, they rested securely under the protection of the blood that was on their doors.

But, at midnight, the Lord smote all the first-born of the Egyptians, from the highest to the lowest, of man and of beasts. The lamentation, and confusion, and distraction, of this scene, can more easily be imagined than described—"There was not a house where there was not one dead."

In dreadful consternation Pharaoh rose up in the night, called for Moses and Aaron, and said to them, "Rise up, and get you forth from among my people, both you and the children of Israel; and go, serve the Lord as ye have said; also take your flocks and your herds, as ye have said; and be gone, and bless me also."

Nor were the Egyptians less alarmed than their king, or less urgent to get the Israelites out of their country. "We," they exclaimed, "are all dead men." Readily, therefore, they gave to them such things as they wanted to accommodate them for their journey; and willingly did the women resign their jewels and raiment to the Hebrew women, to fit them for wandering in the wilderness, and probably to engage them to hurry their husbands out of the country.

Thus thrust out of Egypt, the children of Israel went from Rameses in Goshen, toward the head of the Red Sea, and assembled at Succoth; a place probably so called from the booths they built there. Their number was about six hundred thousand Israelites who were men, besides their children; and, besides, a mixed multitude of Egyptians and strangers, who, in all likelihood, had been in slavery with them. Their flocks and herds accompanied them, in number very great. This event happened four hundred and thirty years after the exodus of Abraham out of Chaldea, and one hundred an twenty-nine years after their slavery commenced in Egypt.

Thus did God begin to fulfil the promise he had made to Abraham, that although his posterity should be afflicted and oppressed, he would deliver them, and would judge the nation who should hold them in bondage; after which he would give them the land of the Amorites for a possession, (xv. 13.) How he delivered them we have seen, and his judgments on Egypt in order to accomplish his purpose. And Moses informs us, that, "at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the self same day, it came to pass, that the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt, (Exodus xii. 41.)

In the judgments God inflicted on Egypt, Pharaoh bore the principal part, because he was the principal person concerned in the oppression of the Israelites, and in holding them in slavery. And because, being of a proud, cruel, and obstinate temper, God chose to humble him by his judgments, and oblige him to submit to his authority, in order to convince the Egyptians, the Israelites, and all nations who should hear the wonders he had wrought, that the God of Israel was the Lord God Almighty, commanding the earth, the air, the water, the clouds, the thunder, the light, the hosts of devouring insects: that there were none called gods among the nations that could do as he did; and, therefore, none besides him who ought to be feared and worshipped.

The obstinacy of Pharaoh proceeded from his proud, cruel, and covetous heart. The station of dignity and power which he held among the Egyptians, and over the Israelites, had confirmed those tempers so strongly, that he would brook no controul. Instead of being wrought upon and mollified by the miracles and signs which God caused to be wrought before him, he hardened himself against them, so long and so repeatedly, that, at last, God gave him up to his own proud imaginations—to follow the suggestions of his own reprobate heart—made reprobate, not by God, but by his obstinate sinning against full evidence, and a strong conviction, that he acted against the will and commandment of God, who required the dismissal of the Israelites from their servitude to him.

If we suppose God to have infused any hardness of heart into Pharaoh, or to have passed any decree of reprobation against him, except in consequence of his wilful and repeated sin, we shall run ourselves into difficulties from which nothing can free us. For,

1. God hath no bad properties or qualities in himself, consequently no hardness of heart. What he hath not, he cannot communicate to others.

2. After it is said, God hardened Pharaoh's heart, more messages were sent to him, more admonitions were given him, more miracles were wrought for his conviction. This conduct, had God passed any decree of reprobation against him, and entirely deprived him of his grace, and the inspirations of his spirit, is irreconcilable with the principles of common sense, of reason, of justice; and mercy and goodness declare directly against it.

3. Through the whole transaction God treated Pharaoh as a person who had a will of his own, and could command his own actions—either let the Israelites depart, or keep them in bondage. Long did he refuse to part with them, as the Lord had forwarned Moses. He did, however, at last, consent, and the Israelites did go. No decree of God, therefore, had passed against his permitting the Israelites to go out of Egypt; and yet that is the very point with respect to which God is said to harden his heart.

God, no doubt, could have taken the Israelites from under the power of Pharaoh, by various means: or he could have taken Pharaoh out of the world, as he seems most justly to have deserved. But God determined, in delivering Israel, to humble Pharaoh, who boasted that he knew not the Lord, nor would dismiss the Israelites at his command. Judgments, therefore, were sent thick upon him: when one ceased another succeeded: that he might be made to know the Lord, and obliged to dismiss his people. Under these judgments he was preserved a monument of God's power, a declaration to the world, that the God who afflicted Pharaoh was alone the God of heaven and earth, almighty and irresistible. To the force of these judgments his proud heart at length submitted. After often relenting, and often returning obstinately to his purpose, convinced of the folly and vanity of striving against God, he consented to the departure of the Israelites, and humbly intreated them to leave his country.

The fault of Pharaoh, therefore, was his supposing his own power superior to every thing in the world, and setting up his own will in opposition to the will of God, who demanded the dismissal of his slaves: his resisting the full evidence, that God had sent Moses to make this demand in his name: his stifling the admonitions and checks of his conscience when his heart relented, and returning again to his foolish and obstinate purpose; acting so long in opposition to the convictions of his own mind, that he rendered himself insensible of the motions of the spirit of God in him, and incapable of judging of the tendency of the dispensations of his providence. When this became his unhappy situation, God gave him up to his own imaginations—to follow the dictates of his own proud and corrupt heart, which drove him on, in folly and sin, to his final destruction.

It is our business to avoid the fatal errors of Pharaoh. Duty, therefore, requires us to regard the admonitions of God by his word and by his ministers; to attend to the check of conscience, his vicegerent in us; to observe the dispensations of his providence; and to let them have their full effect on us; to comply with the motions and inspirations of his spirit in us, when they check us in evil, or excite us to that which is good. Ever remembering, that obstinate and wilful sinning against the means of grace, the admonitions of conscience, the events of Divine Providence, the motions and solicitations of the spirit of holiness, will harden the heart, and render it incapable of being governed by them; indeed, insensible of them. The sentence of reprobation will then pass against us, as surely as it did against Pharaoh. It is, in truth, the very state of reprobation. We express it, or rather it is expressed to us, by God's withdrawing from us his grace and holy spirit, because we make no, or an ill use of them. But it is an expression accommodated to human infirmity. To us there is eventually no difference, whether by hardening the heart through repeated acts of wilful sin, we render ourselves incapable of obeying the motions of the spirit of God, or whether he take them from us. “To him that hath,” said the blessed Jesus—that obeys and follows the motions of God’s spirit—“shall be given;” they shall be continued and increased, “and he shall have abundance.” “But from him that hath not”—that makes no, or an ill use of the grace of God, and of the influence of his spirit, “shall be taken away, even that which he hath.” God is the same now he ever was. He altereth not, nor changeth. The same rule which guided his conduct to men, in the days of Pharaoh, guided it also in the time of Christ’s humanity, and still guides it. He is “no respecter of persons, but will render to every man according to his deeds. In every nation, he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him.” But the obstinately and impenitently wicked shall feel his indignation and wrath, in tribulation and anguish, whenever it pleaseth him to take account of their actions.

PART THE FIFTH.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE HISTORY OF PHARAOH.

HOWEVER the proud heart of Pharaoh was broken down by the destruction of the first-born, the impressions of goodness continued not long. Hardened in sin by long and wilful habit; and, by the just judgment of God, deprived of his favour and of the motions of his spirit; when the first shock was over, he returned violently to his old track, inflamed by resentment and the thirst of revenge. The pride of his heart arose again, and his obstinate temper recovered its former perverse bias. Great and urgent as the occasion had been, and right as his conduct was in dismissing the Israelites, forgetting the authority of God, and all he and his kingdom had suffered from the exertions of divine power, he repented of his submission, and was no sooner told that the Israelites were actually gone, than his heart, and the hearts of his servants, turned against them. “Why have we done this," they hastily asked, "that we have let Israel go from serving us?" And immediately Pharaoh made ready for war, and pursued after them.

It is remarked, that God led not the Israelites out of Egypt by the shortest rout to Canaan, through the country of the Philistines, because the Philistines were a warlike people, and would probably oppose them, and the Israelites were unprepared for war, both in arms and in discipline, and were incumbered with flocks and herds, women and children. But God led them by the Red Sea, into a country that was wild and desert, where they would meet with no enemy, at least not till they came to the borders of Canaan; by which time they would be inured to the fatigue and order of marching and encamping, and to the use of arms by exercise and discipline. Whether by their taking this rout, Pharaoh was led to suppose they would find their marching impracticable, and being shut in by the wilderness and the Red Sea, would fall into despair, and become an easy prey to his army; or, whatever other imagination occupied his perverse heart, we have a right to say, the hand of God was in it. He hardened the heart of Pharaoh, not by infusing hardness or obstinacy into it, nor by passing any decree that it should be hardened, but by this very rout which he directed the Israelites to take. It deceived Pharaoh, and led him to destruction.

The reason why God had preserved Pharaoh now ceased. He had shown his power over him before the Egyptians, and Israelites, and the whole world. He had given the fullest and clearest testimony that he alone was God in heaven and in earth; that he had the command of all the elements, and made them subservient to his will; that the beasts of the earth were in his hand, and were governed at his pleasure;* that he was the Lord of life and death, and could preserve his own people, as well as strike the first-born of the Egyptians all dead in an instant. He had, moreover, broken down the stubborn heart of Pharaoh, long hardened in sin, and obstinately determined not to submit to his will; and had obliged him to send his people, whom he had determined, at all risks, to keep in servitude, in freedom out of his country.

In the judgments by which this event had been accomplished, Pharaoh, and his servants, and people, were remarkably punished for their cruelty and oppression of the Israelites, and for their proud and arrogant opposition to the command of God. And had Pharaoh been quiet, and suffered that people to have gone off unmolested, after he had dismissed them, I see no reason to suppose, that destruction, or any further judgment from God, on their account, would have come upon him. But God saw that the submission of Pharaoh was only temporary; that the pride and hardness of his heart would soon return; that he would follow the

* Some critics have supposed, that the word translated swarms of flies, should be, a mixture of noisome beasts, and so it is rendered in the margin of our Bible, viz. lions, tigers, &c.

Israelites, and endeavour either to reduce them again to servitude, or destroy them. He, therefore, laid this snare for him; that if he foolishly pursued, he might bring such destruction on himself, now that Divine Providence had nothing more to fulfil by his living, as might manifest and render conspicuous the power, and majesty, and justice of God; most effectually break the strength of Egypt; and secure his people from immediate molestation: and, at the same time, might convince the Israelites, that as he was able to destroy the Egyptians, and save his own people by ways and means of which they never thought, so he was equally able to conduct them through the wilderness in safety, and settle them securely in Canaan, against all opposition which their enemies could form. The natural consequence to be drawn from this conviction was, that they ought to put their trust in him, to worship, and serve, and obey him punctually, and with all their heart.

Pharaoh, having taken the mad resolution of pursuing the Israelites, set out with all the horse of his army, that he could assemble on so sudden an emergency: particularly with six hundred chosen chariots of war, and all the chariots of Egypt; and overtook the Israelites encamped by the Red Sea. For, instead of leading them from Etham, where they encamped when they moved from Succoth, directly into the wilderness of that name, by the head of the Red Sea, God directed Moses to turn to the right hand, and march down the border of the sea, and encamp at Pihahiroth, between Migdol and the sea. By Pihahiroth, some critics tell us, is denoted a gap in the mountains, which, on that shore, form the bank of the sea, and render it inaccessible, but through that gap. Accordingly they translate this passage, encamp before the gap Eiroth, which, they say, was its name. However this be, at Pihahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal Zephon, Pharaoh found them encamped.

When the Israelites saw the Egyptian army approach, in dreadful consternation they “cried out unto the Lord,” for help. Severely, too, did they upbraid Moses for bringing them out of Egypt, as if Egypt could not have afforded graves to bury them; protesting that it had been better to serve the Egyptians, bad as that was, than to perish miserably there by the relentless army of Pharaoh.

To judge merely from their situation, and leave God their protector out of the account, they had, indeed, reason more than enough for their dependency. From Pharaoh they could expect no mercy, hard-hearted as he was, and enraged at what he had lately suffered. On their left, was the Red Sea, deep and impassable. On their right, lay Egypt, from which they had lately departed. In their front was a country, on account of its mountains, impracticable for large bodies of people incumbered with women, and children, and herds of cattle. And, in their rear, was the numerous army of Pharaoh.

The greatness of their danger did not make it more difficult for God to deliver them; and their gratitude, probably, would be greater, the greater their danger had been. Great as it was, the fortitude of Moses forsook him not; nor did the reproachful remarks of the Israelites excite any resentment in him. "Fear ye not," said he to them, "stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord, which he will show you to-day; for the Egyptians whom ye have seen to-day, ye shall see them again no more forever."

Their deliverance was to be eminently the work of God, and, therefore, no efforts of theirs were required, lest they should pretend to share the glory of their deliverance with him, or say that their own strength or courage had saved them.

At this time, Moses seems to have been employed in prayer and supplication to God. From his faith and piety we might naturally expect, that devout and earnest intreaty would flow from his heart to the Almighty Protector of him and his people. "Why criest thou unto me?" said God to him; not blaming him for praying, but intimating that it was a time for action, as well as for prayer: "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward;" that is, through the gap Eiroth, toward the sea. "But lift up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand over the sea, and divide it; and the children of Israel shall go on dry ground through the midst of the sea. And I, behold I will harden the hearts of the Egyptians, and they shall follow them: and I will get me honour upon Pharaoh, and upon all his host, upon his chariots, and upon his horsemen."

It was towards the close of day when Pharaoh came up with the Israelites. Whether too late to make an immediate attack upon them, or whether he waited till the darkness should add to their confusion and distress, we know not. Unarmed and undisciplined as they were, he could have no fear of much resistance, and seems to have had no apprehension of their escaping from him. But, that he might not fall upon the Israelites in the night, the angel of God, and the pillar of a cloud, which hitherto had gone before them to conduct them in their march, removed, and went behind them, between the camp of the Egyptians and the camp of Israel. To the latter it gave light, while, to the former, it was a cloud of darkness, which effectually prevented any operations against the Israelites.

Moses having, in obedience to God, extended his rod over the sea, a strong east wind,* which blew across the head of it, where the Israelites passed, divided its waters, and made an open and dry passage for the Israelites, who, guided by the light from the cloud behind them, went through the sea on dry ground, the water standing in heaps, like a wall, on each side of them. Inconsiderate Pharaoh, with his chariots and horsemen, followed

* Or south-west wind, according to the lxx. This seems the most probable, and I should prefer it, if the Hebrew word will bear it: and that it will, Bishop Patrick cites the authority of Bochart. The sea was divided by a strong wind, which blew across it—if from the eastward, it would be directly in the faces of the Israelites, and make their march difficult and slow. If from the westward, it would be in their backs, and would not impede them.

them into the sea, never more to return out of it. For,

“ In the morning watch, the Lord looked unto the host of the Egyptians, through the pillar of fire and of the cloud, and troubled the host of the Egyptians, and took off their chariot-wheels that they drove them heavily.” They, therefore, attempted to return from the pursuit, convinced that the Lord fought for the Israelites against them.

As soon as the Israelites had all passed over, and the Egyptians, with their disabled chariots, were struggling to return, Moses, by divine command, stretched forth his hand over the sea, and the sea returned to his strength when the morning appeared, overwhelming the Egyptians fleeing and struggling against it. Of all the chariots and horsemen which pursued the Israelites, not one escaped; all perished in the sight of the Israelites, who stood securely on the further shore, and beheld the destruction of their enemies.

Thus perished the proud and haughty Pharaoh, and his no less proud and haughty army, in one of the most fool-hardy and ridiculous enterprizes that man ever attempted. When Moses first demanded the freedom of the Israelites in the name of the Lord, he sternly replied, “ I know not the Lord, neither will I let Israel go.” The many severe judgments he suffered, and the evident distinction made between the Israelites and the Egyptians, in the extent and operation of the miracles that were wrought, would have convinced any reasonable man, that God, who demanded the Israelites, was God Almighty: he who had made the heaven and the earth, and who commanded all the elements and powers of them; and that he was the particular guardian and protector of Israel. Unawed by all that had happened, he absurdly imagined, that, with an armed host, he could recover from the hand of God the people whom he had lately been obliged, against his will and utmost opposition, to give up to him. Blinded with pride and rage, he heedlessly pursued them; and, in the darkness of the night and of the cloud that was before him, he does not seem to have been sensible that he had got into the bed of the sea, till the disorder of his chariots, from the breaking or losing of the wheels, or (as some have supposed) from their sinking deep into the mud, informed him, he had got on ground improper for his army.

It was the beginning of the night, when the angel of God and the pillar of the cloud took their station between the camp of Israel and of Egypt. Immediately after, Moses stretched out his hand over the sea, and it was divided. We cannot suppose that the Israelites stayed long before they entered the gulph, for they had been put in motion before Moses stretched out his hand. The Egyptians, perceiving by the noise, or by the little light they had, that the Israelites were moving from them, attempted to follow, that they might not escape; for, as soldiers, they had nothing to fear from them. It was in the morning watch when the disorder of their chariots obliged them to retire; and it was day when the sea, returning to its place, overwhelmed them.

The Jews divided the night into four watches. The first began at six o'clock, and lasted till nine; the second continued till midnight; the third till three o'clock; and the fourth, called the morning watch, till six. The distress of the Egyptians began, therefore, after three o'clock; probably just at day-light. They, consequently, entered the bed of the Red Sea in the night, which, by the interposition of the cloud, was made supernaturally dark. Deceived by that darkness, and eager in the pursuit of the Israelites, they may not have known where they were. And, from their confidence that the Israelites were between them and the sea, may have been apprehensive of no such disaster as befel them, till it was too late to retire.

This seems to be the best apology for the infatuated conduct of Pharaoh. For, if, on the other hand, we suppose that he knowingly and designedly followed the Israelites into the bed of the sea, no conduct could have been so void of common sense, or so consummately rash and foolish. He must have known that the opening in the water was apparently made by the force of a violent wind, for the continuance of which he had no security, even for one minute. He must have been sensible that the God of Israel commanded all the elements of the world at his pleasure, and that they all had been, in turns, made the instruments of dreadful calamities to him and his people, on account, too, of those very Israelites whom he then pursued. He must also have felt, that the horrible darkness of the night took from him the capacity of judging, with due precision, of any thing before him. Under these circumstances, to risk his own safety, and the safety of his army, by attempting a passage of several miles, made through the sea by the force of the wind, only to gratify his rage and thirst of revenge against the Israelites, exceeds all conception of human folly.

In the account of the catastrophe of Pharaoh, the expressions, “the Lord looked unto the host of the Egyptians, through the pillar of fire and of the cloud, and troubled the host of the Egyptians, and took off their chariot wheels;” and the exclamation of the Egyptians, “the Lord fighteth for Israel against the Egyptians,” have given some trouble to fix their meaning.

To a person who believes the power and particular providence of Almighty God, and the ministry of his mighty angels, I see not that those expressions ought to give the least embarrassment. If, however, we wish to accommodate them more to human comprehension, let us suppose that the Egyptians had got in the bed of the sea, without knowing on what ground they were: let us further suppose, that extreme darkness prevented them from seeing the water heaped up like a wall on each side of them. From what hath been observed, these circumstances are highly probable. Only, then, continue the supposition, that, just at daylight, the bright cloud which had illuminated the Israelites, was suddenly turned to the Egyptians, and discovered to them their real situation, and their danger from the mass of water on either side of them, just ready to pour down on their heads. Is it surprizing that they should endeavour to escape from such a scene; that they should fall into confusion in the attempt; that their chariot-wheels should entangle and lock together, be broken, or torn off, or, by mere sinking in the sand, should drag heavily?

The Lord is said to look through the pillar of fire and the cloud. This gives probability to what Josephus hath related (Jud. Antiq. lib. ii. ad finem), that a dreadful tempest of thunder, and lightning, and hail, from this cloud, assaulted the Egyptians. Lay all these circumstances together, and that the Egyptians should be frightened, astonished, confounded, and should cry out, in despair, “Let us flee from the face of Israel, for the Lord fighteth for them against the Egyptians,” can give surprize to no one.

Thus did God, in his anger, destroy the Egyptians, and, in mercy, save his chosen people; literally fulfilling what Moses had predicted to them in their deep distress; “Fear ye not, stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord, which he will show you to-day. The Lord shall fight, and ye shall hold your peace.”

To this scene, most applicable are the words of the psalmist, which, if they do not particularly describe, seem to explain the manner in which the Lord looked upon, and troubled, and fought against the Egyptians in the Red Sea: “The clouds poured out water, the air thundered, and thine arrows went abroad. The voice of thy thunder was heard; the lightnings shone on the ground; the earth was moved and shook," (Ps. lxxvii. 17, 18.) Every token and instrument of Almighty displeasure, every circumstance that could strike terror into the human heart, or make the wicked feel or dread the vengeance of an incensed God, seem, at this time, to have been poured upon the heads of the abandoned Egyptians.

From such scenes let us learn to fear, and, by obeying him, avoid the strokes of God's displeasure. Penitence and faith, through the atonement of Jesus, will recommend us to the arms of his mercy, and open to us the gate of everlasting life. And,

"From scenes like these, we" may "learn to form an idea of that power which discomfited the infernal host; raised Christ from the dead; vanquished opposition and persecution; subdued the world to the obedience of faith; supports and protects the church; will overthrow antichrist; raise the dead; cast the wicked, with death and satan, into the lake of fire; and exalt the righteous, to sing, with angels in heaven, 'the song of Moses and of the lamb:'* Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints," (Rev. xv. 3.)

Thus have we pursued the conduct of Pharaoh, from the first message sent to him by God, to the fatal event in the Red Sea. That pride and obstinacy were his first faults must be evident; and dreadfully did he pay the penalty of them.

Many reflections which will be of use to the prudent man may be drawn from this history that has been before us, with some of which I purpose to conclude this discourse. But it seems reasonable to attend, in the first place, to an observation which, I presume, every person will make on reading the history of Pharaoh. In all the miracles and events produced by the alone power of God, some outward and visible means were directed to accomplish his purpose.

In what we call the productions of nature, it is easily discernible that the powers of nature are only the energy of God operating in his works, and not any influence they have independent on him; that is, the power of God, which first spoke them into being, still operating on them, produces those effects which we call natural. Whether this be necessary for man, composed as he is of body and soul, that there may be something to affect his bodily senses, and point out to him the inward operation of God on the soul, by his outward operation in that external something which he hath appointed to indicate and effect his purpose, is a disquisition which it is not necessary for us to settle. The use of external means, we know, is of service to gain credit to the messengers of God; and point out to men, that he hath ordered those messengers to work such miracles, by the use of such means, as cannot possibly have any natural effect that way; and, therefore, that he hath sent them, and speaks and acts through them.

Most of the miracles in Egypt were apparently wrought by virtue of the rod of Moses. This rod was, probably, the staff he carried in his hand when he tended the flocks of Jethro, and could have no virtue in it to produce the effects which followed upon the use of it, more than it had to convert itself into a serpent. It was, however, the instrument which God directed Moses to use in performing the wonders which he wrought. God wrought in it and by it, and could have operated as well without it, had he so pleased.

That we might assuredly know this, and ascribe its whole efficacy to God, and not to the rod, some miracles were wrought without its intervention; namely, the judgment of the swarms of flies, and the murrain among the cattle. This circumstance teacheth us,

1. That Moses, who used his rod, and wrought miracles with it only at the command of God, was really his messenger, and was aided by his authority.

2. It should make us careful in the use of all those means which God hath appointed for us in his holy religion, and to employ them devoutly in the manner he hath directed; and then to entertain no doubt of their efficacy to the purposes for which they are appointed. In this sense, the Sacraments in the christian Church become essentially necessary for us, where they can be had. Nor have we more reason to expect the grace of God, and those blessings which are exhibited by the Sacraments, without the use of them, than Moses would have had to expect the miraculous interposition of God, without the use of his rod, when God commanded him to stretch it forth. And to doubt of the efficacy of the Sacraments, is the same infidelity in us, that it would have been in Moses to have doubted of the efficacy of his rod, when God commanded him to employ it.

3. It should teach us not to attribute any sanctity or efficacy to Sacraments independent of God's appointment; but to ascribe their whole efficacy to him who hath ordained, and operates in them.

But, in some of the miracles in Egypt, other means were sometimes used besides, or instead of the rod. The locusts were brought, and the Red Sea was divided by a strong east wind, even when Moses had employed his rod by God's command. No rod was stretched forth when the boils with inflammation infested the Egyptians: That judgment was produced by sprinkling ashes towards heaven in the sight of Pharaoh. For though God, in the operations of nature, hath confined himself to fixed rules of acting, it is for our sakes he hath done so, that we might know what events to expect from certain causes: yet, in those operations which are beside, or beyond the powers of nature, he is not confined to particular means, nor, indeed, to any means at all, but can operate without, or by any, as he seeth good. However, when he hath appointed means for us, they become obligatory on us. Nor have we a right to expect the blessings annexed to them, if we use not the means appointed for the conveyance of them.

DISCOURSE I.

PART THE SIXTH.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE HISTORY OF PHARAOH.

THE attentive mind will readily remark, that few of the judgments of God came upon Pharaoh without previous notice, generally of one day, that if he continued obstinate, such or such a thing should happen to him. When he was threatened with the storm of hail, and apprized of its dreadful violence, he and his servants were advised to shelter their servants and cattle against its fury. When he was under the correction of any judgment, and requested the interposition of Moses to deliver him from it, it was always, and speedily, removed on his intercession.

These are instances of the goodness of God, who does not willingly punish, nor punish any but obstinate offenders. Nor was his goodness confined to Pharaoh. To us, to all men, he hath graciously made known the dreadful consequence of a wicked, impenitent life. He hath also advised and directed us to shelter ourselves against the storm of his anger, by penitence and faith in Jesus the Redeemer, and obedience to him, according to the best of our power. If we regard not his warning, we shall fare as did the servants and cattle of Pharaoh, and the incredulous Egyptians—sink under the blast of God's displeasure.

The reflections which I shall make on this subject will be drawn from the temper of mind which Pharaoh's conduct discovered, and will principally relate to our practice.

It hath been observed, that the original faults of his temper were pride and obstinacy. They generally go together. Obstinacy, indeed, seems to be the natural offspring of pride. To give up a point, or recede from a sentiment, would, in the opinion of the proud man, lessen his dignity, and sink him in the estimation of others. He, therefore, obstinately pursues the point to the end, be it right or wrong, of great or of little importance, good or evil in its consequences.

Another certain effect of pride appears to me to be covetousness. I mean not that none are covetous but proud people; though, I fear, proud people always are so: not merely of money, but of all things in which they think their interest, or honour, or dignity is concerned. Every thing of this kind, they, as much as possible, arrogate to themselves, and endeavour to manage in such a way as shall secure and increase their own importance.

Pride, and obstinacy, and covetousness, if not necessarily, yet certainly produce cruelty, or a conduct towards others void of humanity; if not always, yet in most instances.

These seem to have been strong lines in Pharaoh's character. His pride made obedience and submission to the will of God severe, if not impracticable duties. His obstinacy prevented him from seeing, or, at least, from attending to the evidence which God laid before him, that he had sent Moses to require the dismissal of the Israelites from their servitude, and made him persist in his determination to keep them at all events. His covetousness led him to consider their detention in slavery as essential to his own wealth and dignity, as well as to the dignity and prosperity of his kingdom; and his cruelty excited him to use every mean, however inhuman, that could break their spirits, and render them more submissive, or prevent their increasing to such numbers as he feared would endanger the safety of his kingdom.

We have seen the fatal issue of Pharaoh's conduct. To avoid every part of it, we must avoid the tempers which led him to it, and which, if indulged, will lead us to destruction, if not equally open and apparent, equally fatal and dreadful. The nature of God is the same it ever was; and the tempers of men, in all ages, are the same, and, under the same circumstances, will ever produce the same effects. Pride, and obstinacy, and covetousness, and cruelty, are ever the same in themselves, and in their effects—destructive to men, odious to God. Be it our constant care to keep them under, by denying and controlling every tendency toward them which we find stirring in us. Pride seems to be the root of them all, and is the grand obstruction to our obedience and submission to God—the great source of that restlessness and impatience under the dispensations of his providence, which we often feel, and too often indulge, when our worldly affairs proceed not as we wish, or had planned. To the same source we may trace those angry resentments, and that desire of revenge which springs up in us under a sense of ill usage, or the opinion of neglect: and, between revenge and cruelty, the distinction is too nice to be easily marked.

Pharaoh, educated in a court, and advanced to a throne, had the natural pride of his heart unhappily increased by the submission that was paid him, so that he could brook neither superior nor contradiction. We who are not kings, nor have been educated in the courts of kings, may suppose ourselves secure from that odious pride which was both the reproach and destruction of Pharaoh. But pride was not peculiar to Pharaoh, nor is it the property of kings and courtiers alone. Although not made for man, it is deep rooted in the human heart; and when not checked, but fostered by education, it becomes the bitter root from which springs every noxious weed. Though not flattered by courtiers, we may have been petted by parents and flattered by friends, and the pride of our hearts so increased and strengthened as to give a disagreeable tincture to all our converse and conduct. Happy will it be for us, if it go no farther—if it do not bring obstinacy, and covetousness, and cruelty, in its train; for misery and destruction will surely follow.

Obstinacy prevented Pharaoh from seeing, at least from regarding the force of the evidence which God caused to be laid before him; and the longer he continued to resist that evidence, the weaker and more depraved became his judgment; till, at last, he was incapable of determining aright in a very plain and important business. Let his behaviour at the Red Sea be an instance to prove this point. Now obstinacy, that is, a determined resolution to follow our own opinion and will at all adventures, will forever, under the same circumstances, produce the same effects. It would as surely now weaken and deprave our judgments concerning the will of God revealed in the holy scriptures, the nature of Christ's church, the doctrines of the gospel, and every thing that relates to eternal life; and prevent our feeling the force of the evidence on which they depend, as it prevented Pharaoh from feeling, that is, acting, according to the force of the evidence which Moses placed before him. To get perfectly free from obstinacy, pride must be banished from the heart: it is the stock of every vice. Cut down the tree, and you destroy the body and branches of all evil tempers and passions. Should shoots spring from the roots, care will keep them under, and, in time, they will die and perish.

From the history of Pharaoh we learn, that his heart, hard as it was, several times relented under the pressure of God's judgments. The frogs, the swarms of flies, the storm of hail, the locusts, the gross tangible darkness, each in its turn, made so much impression on his stubborn disposition, that he sent for Moses and Aaron; begged to be delivered from the present calamity; and promised, on that condition, to let the Israelites depart as they had required. It is true, on all these occasions, he endeavoured to obtain some mitigation of the terms on which they were demanded—that their children or their cattle should be left behind, as a security for their return—or that they should go a very little way: nor did he keep his word when the judgment was removed, but returned to the habitual bent of his mind.

He acted as most other wicked people act. He was sorry that his sin subjected him to punishment, and wished to retain the sin, but to get rid of the punishment as soon as he could. When, therefore, he saw, that, by the goodness of God, there was respite from the punishment which he suffered, he kept to his first resolution, not to let the people go, and thereby increased the obstinacy of his temper.

Similar observations have been made on people in sickness. While they suffer, and the prospect of death is open before them, they are very penitent, and full of good resolutions. But no sooner does health return, but their penitence and good resolutions are forgotten; they return to their old sins and evil habits with greater avidity, and become more hardened, and worse than they were before.

The case of Pharaoh, therefore, is not a singular one, whatever its particular circumstances may have been. Let us ever guard carefully against a conduct so base in itself, and so provoking to God. It always hardens the heart, and makes it more careless both of the mercy and anger of God. Our greatest security is in amendment while we are in health; for on our own future purposes and good resolutions no great dependence can be made, especially when the passions of the mind and appetites of the body are weakened and brought low by pain and sickness. With health they will return to their strength, and our good purposes will probably vanish before them.

It is highly probable that Pharaoh was encouraged in his opposition to the demand of God, and in his obstinate resolution to abide by his first purpose to keep the Israelites in bondage, by the advice and flattery of his wise men or magicians. According to a prevalent tradition among the old Jews, the two most eminent of those men, Jannes and Jambres, to whom they add another by the name of Sanidas, accompanied Pharaoh in his expedition, and perished with him in the Red Sea. The fatal consequence of their advice and persuasion ought to be an admonition to us, not to suffer the wits and flatteries of plausible, designing men, to lead us away from the plain declarations of God, in his holy word, or from the unity of his church, to which he hath promised external life. If we do, we sin after the example of Pharaoh beguiled by his magicians. And if we partake in his sin; that is, if we sin from an evil, hard heart of unbelief, and continue impenitent in it, as he did, we cannot think it strange if we partake also in his punishment—not by literally drowning in the Red Sea, but by being given up of God to our own reprobate mind, to fill up the measure of our iniquity in this world, and sink into the gulph of misery in the world to come. Repent, therefore, while it is “to-day”—delay it not till to-morrow—“lest any of you be hardened through” the deceitfulness of sin, “and God” swear in “his” wrath, “you shall not enter into his rest.”

It hath been made an objection to the honesty and sincerity of Moses, that he demanded of Pharaoh leave for the Israelites to go three days journey into the wilderness, to hold a feast unto the Lord their God, which plainly implied an intention of returning when the feast was ended: whereas he had no intention of returning at all; but to go, and drive out the Canaanites, and take possession of their country: that Pharaoh’s suspicion of their not returning was the true reason why he refused to let them go; having several times offered to comply literally with their request, if they would leave any pledge behind them—their children, or their flocks and herds—to ensure their return.

It is certain that Moses delivered the precise message to Pharaoh with which he was charged from God. It is also certain, that God intended, at this time, to deliver his people from their bondage in Egypt, and to settle them in Canaan, ac-according to his promise to Abraham. Whatever insincerity is suspected to have been in the business, must be charged to God, who gave the direction. By exactly doing as he was ordered, Moses hath kept himself free from blame.—It does not, however, appear by what rule of honesty or morality God was obliged to open his whole intention to Pharaoh. The demand that was made was enough to try his temper, whether he was disposed to obey God. And why make the demand higher? Why lay open the full purpose of God to a man not disposed to obey him? or till it was known that he had a disposition to obey him? The trial to be made was a trial of the state of Pharaoh's heart. The demand of leave for three days journey was enough for that purpose. Had Pharaoh consented, it is impossible to say what the precise conduct of God toward him would have been, further than that the Egyptians would have been exempt from all punishment.

The Israelites were the peculiar people of God, by a covenant made with their ancestors. They were held in bondage by Pharaoh upon the presence, that his predecessors having conquered the country in which they resided, had a right to make slaves of them. God had foreseen their bondage, and had promised to deliver them, and the time for the fulfilment of his promise drew near. Leave for them to go three days journey was demanded, and was repeatedly refused. We have a right to say that the procedure of God with Pharaoh, upon his refusal, was reasonable, just, and equitable. Nor have we any right to suppose, but that, had Pharaoh consented, the conduct of God would have continued to have been reasonable, just, and equitable towards him.

The objection we have been considering leaves us to inquire for some reason, why God permitted his peculiar, covenanted people, to fall into such vassalage and oppression, as required great wonders and severe judgments to deliver them?

The display of the power and justice of Almighty God, which was made in the deliverance of Israel, had a direct tendency to check the world, and especially the Egyptians, in their progress in idolatry, into which they seem to have been hastening, and fast sinking, by convincing them that the Lord God of the Hebrews was the only God, who ruled the heaven and the earth, the elements of the world, and all the powers of nature, as he pleased: nor would the display of God's power in Egypt be of less service to the Israelites, than to the Egyptians. They saw it exercised before their eyes, and for their benefit: they found themselves secured from the judgments which the Egyptians endured, and, at length, delivered by them from the thralldom they suffered. Highly favoured as they were by God, who proclaimed himself to be the God of their fathers, they would, the more likely, continue in his worship and service, and not turn away to the worship of the gods of the heathen, who could neither save nor help those who trusted in them.

Another reason why God permitted his people to fall into bondage, may have been to prepare them, by the discipline of affliction, for that religious and civil œconomy under which he intended to place them; the fundamental principle of which was, that he only was God, the Creator, Preserver, and Governor of heaven and earth; who had brought them out of Egypt, and settled them in Canaan: that, therefore, they ought to worship and serve him only, and obey him in all things, and in the precise manner which he should command.

But, it is highly probable, that in the long sojourning of the Israelites in Egypt, both their religion and their manners had been corrupted by their conversation with the Egyptians, and the absolute power they exercised over them. Their after conduct in the wilderness seems to indicate as much. That they had a strong propensity to idolatry, appears from the molten calf which Aaron made. And the reluctance with which they conformed to the directions of God showed itself, as in other instances, so particularly in the conduct of Nadab and Abihu, who offered incense with strange, that is, with common fire, when God had ordered it to be done with fire from the altar; and in the rebellion of Corah and his company. Their departure from the ancient simplicity and rectitude of manners, and their compliance with the idolatrous rites of the Egyptians, may have made it necessary for God to chastise them by affliction, in order to bring them back to a sense of their duty, and convince them that he alone was

God, and alone to be worshipped and obeyed. Their bondage and hard usage would also make them more willing to leave Egypt, whenever it should please God to order them to do so; and more thankful for their deliverance, and for the blessings of freedom and a happy establishment in the land of Canaan.

The pious christian will excuse my adding one reason more, why God suffered his people to fall into a state of hard and apparently irremediable servitude in Egypt, previous to his bringing them out from thence. It is a reason which, I confess, I consider as a principal one, and to have been chiefly intended by Almighty God, in that dispensation of his providence.

It is only by analogy with temporal things, that we can have any notion of things that are spiritual and eternal. All our thoughts and all our expressions about God, and spirit, and religion, and another life, are drawn from corporeal objects, from ideas which we get by our own senses, and apply them, by accommodation, to spiritual subjects. Nor does it appear how we could get any notion, or form any sentiment of the tyranny of evil spirits over the soul, or of the hard bondage of serving corrupt lusts and passions, but from the rigorous oppression and hopeless misery of the body from the arbitrary dominion and severe exactions of unjust and cruel men.* The hard bondage of sin and fallen into which the whole human nature sunk by the apostasy of Adam; the wretchedness which hath since attended every man born into the world; the impossibility that man should relieve and restore himself; the rage and malice of his grand adversary against both him and every man of his happiness, and his utter inability to resist him, we have been taught by the instruction of God, and experience convinceth us that his instruction is true.

If, therefore, God suffered his chosen people to sink into oppression and wretchedness, under the tyranny of the Egyptians, so that there was no human hope of help for them; if he permitted nothing to interfere in their deliverance but his own arm and power; if he delivered them in direct contradiction to the fixed determination and stubborn opposition of their merciless oppressors, by means utterly beyond the contrivance of human wisdom, and the efforts of human power; and, in that event, destroyed their relentless enemies in the most astonishing manner—it exhibits such a representation and picture of the misery of the world, under the tyranny of the devil, of sin, and of death; of the mercy, and goodness, and love, and power of God, in its deliverance by the mediation and atonement of Jesus Christ, both God and man, as no other earthly scene could possibly make—a representation which we can easily understand, which we must feel to be real and true; and by it have our faith confirmed, that as God did save his people, the Church of Israel, from the tyranny and malice of Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who were destroyed in the Red Sea; so he will finally complete the salvation he hath already begun, of his people, the Church of Jesus Christ, by casting its enemies, the devil, sin, and death, into the lake of fire preparing for the devil and his angels. (Rev. xx. 14.)

In terms taken from temporal blessings, the prophets generally speak of the divine favour and salvation of Messiah; and in the same terms, the blessed Redeemer Jesus applied what they had said to himself: "The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor, he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." (Isa. lxi. 1. Luke iv. 18.) To the spiritual blessings of the all-gracious Redeemer, let us raise our thoughts from these expressions of temporal good things: they are figures of better things, more precious hopes, more excellent blessings, than any that can be enjoyed in this world; and ought to fix our faith on him as the anointed of the Father, sent to make known the gospel of salvation to man made poor and wretched by his apostasy from God; to heal the heart broken by the thralldom of sin, and penitent through a due sense of its evil nature; to preach deliverance to the captives of Satan and death; recovery of sight, through his atonement, to the mind blinded with error, with ignorance of God and of life eternal; to set at liberty those who are bruised with the hard service of vicious lusts and domineering passions, and bring them into the perfect freedom of the sons of God; to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord—the day of salvation—the season of his merciful visitation to all the sons of lost Adam who will hear and regard him, and turn from the servitude of sin to the free obedience of his law.

This is the end of all the dispensations of God to fallen man, to bring him back from his apostasy, and restore him to that state in the creation for which he was originally designed; that, under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, he may live and be happy in perfect obedience and absolute dependence on God his Creator. When this is done, all is done that can insure happiness to us: and till this be done, nothing is done to effect in our salvation. To bring this about is the design of Christ's mediation, and of all he ever did or suffered for us. To make us fully sensible of the want and necessity of his interposition, God permitted his chosen people to fall into hard bondage in Egypt. To assure us of the certainty and perfection of redemption through Christ, he fully and perfectly delivered his people at the Red Sea, and overwhelmed their enemies in horrible destruction. To demonstrate the possibility of our rendering void, by our sins and evil deeds, the redemption of Christ, as far as we are personally concerned, God gave up those whom he had brought out of Egypt, to perish in the wilderness, because of their impenitency and unbelief. To convince us that the redemption of Christ will be completely effectual to all who obey God, Joshua and Caleb were conducted into Canaan, according to the promise he had made, on account of their fidelity and obedience.

These considerations will, I trust, have their full weight. Then shall we rejoice in penitence for our sins, in faith and obedience to God, in resignation to his will, in the sense of his mercy and goodness, in the power of his grace, in the dispensations of his providence; and, under the inspirations of his Spirit, shall live in the ways of holiness, and die in the hope of glory through Jesus Christ.

DISCOURSE II.

MERCY AND JUDGMENT.

ROM. ix. 18. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth.

THIS Text being often misunderstood, at least misinterpreted, I have thought it best to endeavour to point out its sense and meaning, according to the Apostle's discourse in which it occurs. It will, I trust, thereby appear, that it contains no position or doctrine inconsistent with the notion I have, in the preceding discourse, given of God's hardening Pharaoh's heart.

The instance of Pharaoh, in this chapter, is introduced by St. Paul, to illustrate the justice of God in rejecting the Jews from being his covenanted people, and consigning them over to punishment, on account of their impenitency and hardness of heart, and calling in the Gentiles to be heirs of the promises made to Abraham.

The Jewish converts to christianity strongly insisted that the Gentiles who embraced the faith of Christ, should submit also to circumcision and the observance of the law of Moses. This they did from the opinion of its necessity, in order to obtain righteousness, that is, justification, or the remission of sins from God, which they supposed was confined to the Mosaic law. This, indeed, seems to have been the chief stumbling-block of the Jews, and the principal reason of their generally rejecting the gospel. However willing they may have been that the Gentile converts should, as christians, be admitted to equal privileges with themselves, they could not bear that they should be exempt from the ceremonial law which they supposed was necessary for them to observe, because God had made it necessary to salvation.

Not only to ward off the ill effects of this opinion, but entirely to root it out, seems to have been the design of St. Paul, in writing his epistle to the Jewish christians at Rome. In it he goes to the bottom of the matter, and endeavours to convince both Jews and Gentiles, that righteousness, justification, remission of sins, that is, freedom, or exemption from punishment on account of sin, could not be obtained by the Jews through the law of Moses, because that law denounced a curse against every one who continued not in all things written in it, to do them; and because they had all been sinners against it, doing those things which it prohibited, and so were liable to the curse denounced by it: nor could the Gentiles be free from punishment by the law or light of nature under which they lived; because they had broken it by their idolatry, and other grievous crimes and immoralties, and were, on that account, condemned of their own consciences.

They must, therefore, both Jews and Gentiles, embrace the gospel, become christians, and rely on the atonement and satisfaction of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of sins. And, having received the gospel which promised forgiveness of sins and eternal life through faith in Jesus Christ, the Gentile must not despise the Jew on account of his attachment to the law; nor ought the Jew to require obedience from the Gentile, nor consider himself as obliged to obey it.

To this account of the method of obtaining remission of sins, the Jews would object, that they were Abraham's seed, to whom the promises of God were made; and that it was absurd to suppose that God would exclude them from the blessings promised—implying forgiveness of sins, and acceptance with God, because they were sinners; and, accept the converted Gentiles, who were not included in the promises, to all the blessings of them, though they were also sinners against God.

To pursue his argument, it became necessary for the Apostle to assert that God had rejected the nation of the Jews from being any longer his covenanted people, on account of the hardness of their hearts, and untractable disposition. In answering the objection, he assigns the reason of this dispensation of God.

The objection consists of two parts, which he answers distinctly. He first distinguisheth between the seed, children, posterity of Abraham according to the promise, and according to the flesh. Ishmael was Abraham's first-born son; born after the promise of Canaan was made to him, and entered into the covenant of circumcision at its first institution: yet Isaac, at that time not born, inherited the promise; for God said, "My covenant will I establish with Isaac, whom Sarah shall bear unto thee." And that the Jews might not object to this instance, as though Ishmael had offended God, and was excluded for his wickedness, St. Paul adds the further instance of Jacob and Esau, twin children of Isaac, and, consequently, children of the same mother; neither of whom could be suspected of having offended God, for they were not yet born into the world, and could have done neither good nor evil: yet God preferred Jacob to be heir of the promise before Esau. All the natural children of Abraham were not, therefore, the children to whom the promise belonged, for they inherited it not.

As to the children of Jacob, to whom the other part of the objection relates: To reject them, and call in the converted Gentiles to inherit the blessings which had belonged to them, was, according to the judgment of God, a punishment for their infidelity and opposition to the strong and clear evidence which had been before them, both from scripture and miracles—that Jesus was Messiah, the Son of God. By resisting this evidence, and refusing to be convinced by it, they had rendered themselves like Pharaoh, hard in heart, and obstinate against the truth, deservedly obnoxious to punishment, and incapable of being benefited by the blessings promised to Abraham. For,

By the children of Abraham cannot be meant his natural descendants; for then Ishmael, and Esau, and the children of Ketura, would not have been excluded, but the children of his faith—they who believed and obeyed God as he did. And if the Gentiles deserved this character, through their faith in Christ, “who is over all, God blessed forever,” they, in truth, are Abraham’s seed, and the heirs of the promises made to him, which the unbelieving Jews now unjustly claimed, and from which they are justly rejected by the righteous judgment of God.

With God there can be no unrighteousness; and this procedure with the Jews, rejecting them for their unbelief and impenitency, was perfectly agreeable to the declaration he had formerly made to Moses; I “will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will shew mercy on whom I will shew mercy.” (Exod. xxxiii. 19.)

Let it be remembered, that this declaration of God was made to Moses concerning the Israelites, who had fallen into idolatry in the matter of the golden calf, and had made themselves naked by their sin; that is, had deprived themselves of the divine presence and protection—had broken and cancelled the covenant of their God, insomuch that he threatened to consume them in a moment. But, on the intercession of Moses, he again took them so far into favour as to promise to go with them, and conduct them to the land he had given them. On this occasion he proclaimed it to be a principal part of his glory to distribute mercy and judgment to offenders, according to his own good pleasure. No more, therefore, was done by God for the idolatrous Gentiles, in receiving them into his church, that is, making them his covenanted people, upon their conversion to christianity, than had been formerly done for the idolatrous Jews, in taking them again to be his people, after the sin of the golden calf.

The principle on which this reasoning is founded could not be controverted by the Jews. It was drawn from a text of their own Scripture; from the solemn declaration of the Lord God of the Hebrews himself, and made on a very solemn occasion. The application, too, was fair and pertinent, and fully justifies the Apostle in the inference he draws from it: “So, then, it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy;” that is, God preferred Isaac to Ishmael, and Jacob to Esau, uninfluenced by the earnest desire of Abraham, who, in requesting of God, “O that Ishmael might live before thee,” willed that Ishmael might be the favoured seed: and equally uninfluenced by the running, the hasty endeavours of Esau to procure the venison which his father longed to eat, that he might, in blessing, transmit to him the promise of God. But the mercy of God showed to Isaac and to Jacob, in making them heirs of the blessing promised to Abraham, was of his own free grace, and mere good will towards them, just as it pleased him who knoweth best on whom to bestow his favours.

The Apostle further illustrateth this matter by the instance of Pharaoh, to whom God thus spake by Moses: "Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might show my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth."

In the observations on the history of Pharaoh it was shown, that the meaning of the expression, "I have raised thee up," is, I have preserved thee under my judgments—have kept thee alive, and not suffered thee to fall by them, as thou hast deserved; that thy punishment might be the more remarkable, and my name and power might be made known to the world. The Apostle then applieth the rule which God had declared to Moses, as being exemplified in the case of Pharaoh; "therefore," for this reason, in this manner, "hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth."

The Apostle, it is true, varies the expression of the latter part of the text; probably to make it comport better with what is said of God's hardening Pharaoh's heart. But it hath been shown, that the expression cannot be interpreted to mean that God infused hardness or obstinacy into his heart, or in any way prevented his obeying him in letting Israel go from his service, without contradicting the whole tenor of the history. Besides, God repeatedly declared to Moses, that Pharaoh would, at last, let them go; though not till a mighty hand and a stretched-out arm obliged him to comply.

That, on several occasions, Pharaoh hardened his own heart, is particularly asserted. So that the most that can be made of God's hardening his heart amounts to this :

1. That God permitted the magicians to work some miracles of the same kind with those of Moses, and that, by those miracles, Pharaoh's heart was hardened.

2. That, in mercy, God removed his judgments when Pharaoh requested it; and, by his lenity, Pharaoh's heart was hardened in obstinacy: "When Pharaoh saw there was respite, he hardened his heart." Finding that Moses would intercede for him, when any judgment pressed too hard upon him to be longer endured; and that God regarded the intercession of Moses, he seems to have less regarded the threat of the next calamity; presuming, perhaps, that should it be inflicted on him, he could prevail with Moses to intercede for its removal.

Under the operation of either of the plagues, had it continued, Pharaoh must have consented to the departure of the Israelites, or sunk under it: or, while the Egyptians were all sore with bites and inflammations; or fixed in their places by thick darkness, the Israelites might have gone unmolested from Egypt; none could have followed them. But then it would not so manifestly have appeared, that the God of the Hebrews was superior to all nature; that he commanded all its powers; and all the elements of the world; that the issues of sickness and health, of life and death, were in his hand: in short, that he was God Almighty, the only object of the faith and worship of reasonable beings.

3. That when Pharaoh had hardened his own heart so repeatedly and desperately that he became insensible, or incapable of the motions and inspirations of the spirit of God, God gave him up to his own devices; that is, left him to himself; but preserved him from immediate death, to make him a conspicuous example of his justice—a monument to the world of his majesty and power.

What, then, we are to understand by God's hardening Pharaoh's heart, is, that when, by abusing the goodness and lenity of God, Pharaoh had hardened himself beyond the influence of God's grace, and mercy, and miracles, God determined to punish him, and destroy him from the earth; but yet, in a way, the most conducive to his own glory and the good of mankind.

In this matter God acted neither capriciously nor unjustly, but on an established and fixed principle—that “he will have mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth;” that is, that he will extend mercy to sinners, or inflict punishment on them, as it pleaseth him, according to his own goodness, and knowledge, and wisdom, and not according to the passions and partialities of human nature.

On this principle no injustice can be charged to God. If he forgive one sinner and punish another, it is not from caprice or mere arbitrary will, but, because he sees that truth and justice demand it—his glory and the good of the creation require it. But, to make this discrimination, he hath reserved to himself, and will suffer no being to interfere in it; nothing being adequate to it but infinite goodness, and mercy, and knowledge, and wisdom.

Nor could the Jews justly object to their being cast off from being God's covenanted people, on this principle. The lenity of God hardened Pharaoh's heart. Hear what God saith to the Jews, by the mouth of his Apostle, in this epistle: "Despiseest thou the riches of his goodness, and forbearance, and long-suffering; not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance? But after thy hardness and impenitent heart, treasurest up unto thyself wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to every man according to his deeds." Both Pharaoh and the Jews abused and despised the goodness of God, and both suffered unexampled, though merited destruction.

When, indeed, the Apostle wrote, the judgments of God had not been fully inflicted on the nation of the Jews: They had not completed the measure of their iniquity. The long-suffering of God yet bore with them: but the sentence of destruction had passed against them. From the mount of Olives, the meek and holy Jesus, to whom all judgment is committed, had beheld their city: and, while the tears of affection flowed down his cheeks, pronounced their doom: "If thou," Jerusalem, "hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes." (Luke xix. 42.) But Jerusalem knew not, she considered not, nor regarded the merciful visitation of God by Jesus, Messiah; therefore was she given up to destruction by cruel enemies. And not many years after the date of this epistle, was the sentence executed by the vindictive Romans.

Nor could the Jews justly complain that God had so long spared them when they deserved punishment—received them often to mercy when they merited to be cut off for their idolatries and wickedness—and, at the last, that he should visit their iniquities, and the iniquities of their forefathers, so severely upon them, rejecting them from the promises made to Abraham, and calling in the Gentiles to supply their place in his covenant, and giving their city and nation up to utter ruin and excision.

If God spared them when they deserved punishment; if he received them to mercy when they merited excision; it only proves that God is gracious, and merciful, long-suffering, and slow to anger. If he visited the iniquities of their fathers upon them, it was because they continued in, and repeated, and would not repent of those iniquities. As God preserved Pharaoh, so he preserved them, till their punishment would most conduce to his glory, and the benefit of the rational world, by making them an illustrious example of his justice and power, who would not be reclaimed by his mercy and goodness.

To this principle the conduct of God is referred in the twenty-second verse of this chapter: "What if God, willing to show his wrath, and to make his power known, endured, with much long-suffering, the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction?"

The only objection that could be made to what the Apostle had said, that God "will have mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardeneth," must be drawn from the absolute power and arbitrary will of God. If God hardened Pharaoh and the impenitent Jews, and reserved them for punishment, why doth he yet find fault with them for their disobedience? They could not resist his will, nor prevent their being hardened if he would harden them; nor, when they were hardened by him, could they repent, and become obedient to him.

The objection is founded on false ground—on a supposition that God hardeneth men, and maketh them sinners, and then consigneth them to punishment from mere will and caprice. But who ever entertained this opinion of God? Mercy and justice, goodness and truth, mark all his dealings with men. "Is there unrighteousness with God?" Who can charge him with injustice, or dispute the equity of his ways? Not his arbitrary will, but the iniquity of sinners, occasions the hardness of their hearts. Not his good pleasure, but their impenitency, consigns them to punishment. God made all for some use, to answer good purposes in the creation—some for purposes more honourable than others, yet all for purposes necessary and useful. A potter hath power over his clay, to make of the same parcel, one vessel to an honourable, and another to a dishonourable use; yet both for uses equally necessary. Or, if the clay prove not good enough to make a vessel unto honour, he can make a second attempt, and form another vessel for which the materials are more proper.

So Pharaoh and the obdurate Jews, no longer answering the purpose of God in their creation, by showing his mercy and goodness by their faith and obedience, became hardened against all the motions of his spirit, not by the arbitrary will of God, but by their own wicked perverseness: they were, therefore, like clay marred in the hand of the potter, (Jer. xviii. 4.) converted to another use—to display to the world the power, and justice, and majesty of God Most High, in the tremendous judgments which he inflicted on them.

To make known the wrath and power of God against impenitent sinners—the vessels of wrath—who, under the goodness and long-suffering of God, have, by their own perverseness, been fitted or made ready for punishment, may be a less honourable purpose, than to “make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore,” by his holy spirit, “prepared unto glory:” but, considering God, as he is represented to us in the holy scriptures, not only as the Creator, but as the moral Governor of the world, it becomes not only useful, but necessary, that his justice, as well as mercy, should be known unto men: otherwise his character as moral Governor must cease; for a Governor who is all mercy, and cannot or will not punish a delinquent who continues obstinate in his disobedience, ought to be called by some other name.

The great difficulty in this matter seems to arise from prejudice and prepossession in favour of Calvin's scheme of predestination; by which he means a decree of election and reprobation, passed by God from eternity, respecting the present conduct and future state of every person born into the world. Calvin was undoubtedly a man of abilities, and his whole conduct shows that he was a man of an assuming, intrepid, and vindictive temper. He busied himself in every thing which concerned the reformation, and with every body who had any influence in it. At last he fixed himself at the head of the Protestants, and became their Pope. Little was done; little was taught but as Calvin liked and advised.

Predestination had been fixed in the church of Rome by St. Austin. Calvin made him his master in divinity, and carried his scheme to its utmost extent. Unhappily, there are fashions in divinity as well as in philosophy; and, on the authority of Calvin, the corruption of the christian doctrine which the church of Rome had made in the matter of predestination, became fashionable among the reformers. All minds were tinged with it; nor did the translators of the Bible into English escape the infection; but, under its influence, gave a Calvinistic turn to very many expressions in it. These expressions are, indeed, oftentimes softened or corrected by the margin, which is generally the better translation. But all our Bibles have not the marginal reading; nor will all readers attend to the margin when they have it. By this mean, predestinarianism, having taken deep root, is not likely to be soon, or entirely rooted out.

All objects are said to appear yellow to the jaundiced eye. Predestination is to the mind what the jaundice is to the body. The whole Bible appears tintured with a sickly, yellow hue, when the predestinarian looks into it, especially if he be of a morose and vindictive temper, as most commonly is the case. To see God consigning the greater part of mankind to eternal misery, in consequence of his own arbitrary decree, just to show that he can do it, and will do it—for the glory of his justice, as they call it—seems to be congenial and grateful to his heart: and, in truth, the consequences of this doctrine, carried to its full extent, however the abettors of it may not own or see them, represent Almighty God, the God of goodness and love, to whom be glory forever, in a more unamiable light than it is possible for human wit to represent the devil.

It will, I trust, appear to every reasonable mind, that nothing said of Pharaoh, or of the impenitent Jews, hath relation to predestination; but, that every thing which happened to them was the consequence of their own wicked and obstinate disposition. God indeed saw this disposition, and spoke of it, and declared what its consequences would be. But no inference can be drawn from thence in favour of predestination: nor to justify those people who, when they live wickedly, or fall into particular sins, pretend that they were predestinated, or fore-ordained to do so—that they are poor weak creatures, and that God left them to themselves, and they could not help it.

Such pleas are directly against established and undoubted truths; established both by the nature of God and the plain declarations of his word. God delighteth not in the destruction of a sinner, but rather that he should be converted and live. He will not, therefore, predestinate any persons to the commission of sin, nor pre-ordain any sins to be committed by them: that would be to predestinate them to destruction, contrary to his own good pleasure. Again;

God is not only described as abounding in love and goodness to us, but also as being our only support and strength; the author and giver of all the abilities of body and mind which we possess; the fountain of grace and goodness in us, without whom we can do nothing that is pleasing to him. He will not, therefore, withdraw from us that grace and strength, without which we can do nothing that is good; that holy spirit, without whose inspiration we cannot have a good thought, working any good design to effect. To leave us to ourselves, would counteract the goodness of his intentions, the designs of his love towards us; and would make us as sure a prey to the strength of temptations, as if an eternal decree of reprobation had passed against us.

That God leaves no man to himself, by withdrawing his holy spirit from him, unless the man first leave God, by sinning wilfully and impenitently against him, till the impressions of goodness are destroyed, and his grace hath no further effect on him; is a maxim, I suppose, acknowledged by all sober divines, and ought to be adopted by all christian people.

Did men look more to the corruption of their hearts; to the strength of the passions and lusts which they inherit from their fallen nature; to the force of temptations which daily assault them; to the little care they take to obey God by doing his will; to their neglect of prayer for the gift of the holy spirit; to their disregard of the public worship and sacraments of the church, the means and instruments of God's grace and blessing; to their utter contempt of christian self-denial, mortification, and fasting; to the full scope they give to all worldly, selfish, and pleasurable desires; they would find a most sure source of all their wickedness and impenitency: They need not charge them to the all-gracious, all-righteous God of heaven and earth.

DISCOURSE III.

THE DOOM OF JERUSALEM.

A Discourse on

LUKE XIX. 41, 42. And when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it, saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes.

WE have considered the history of Pharaoh, particularly what is meant by God's hardening his heart. We have adverted to the fate of the Israelites who were delivered from Egypt, and afterward perished in the wilderness. We have attended to the conduct and punishment of the latter Jews in the time of Christ; and have explained the meaning of that text which saith, "Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth."

It may be worth our while to consider whether these things concern Christians. If God dealt with Pharaoh and the Jews in such a manner as he never did, and never will deal with others, we have little or nothing to do with them, further than curiosity and amusement are concerned. But, if he intended them as warnings and admonitions to us, as examples of the fatal issue of their conduct, and an exemplification of a fixed rule of his dealing with them and with all mankind, we shall find ourselves most deeply interested in whatever related to them. Under the full persuasion that we are so, I take the liberty to bring before you the particular case of the Jews, and the final sentence which Christ passed upon their capital city, Jerusalem, in the words of the Text; hoping that your candour will excuse the repetition of sentiments and circumstances that have been before mentioned, or briefly considered.

It is apparent that God dealt with his old people, the church of the Jews, by the same rule by which he dealt with Pharaoh. And, as he is no respecter of persons, but “will have mercy on whom he will have mercy, and hardeneth whom he will;” that is, dispenseth the blessings of his grace and mercy, or executeth his judgments, according to his own good pleasure; rendering to every man according to his deeds, and agreeably to the state he hath formed for himself: What good reason can be given, why he should not deal with Christians as he dealt with Pharaoh and the Jews, if, as Pharaoh and the Jews did, they harden the heart against him, and pass their day of grace in obstinate and final impenitency?

Christians profess to believe, that the Bible contains the history of God’s revelation to the world; making known his will, and directing the conduct of men: that it sets forth the history of many things he hath done in the world to particular nations of men, relative to their conduct compared with his will made known to them; so that, seeing the blessings and judgments his hand hath dispensed to others, they may be induced to live in obedience to him who is the author of life, and the giver of every good thing to his creatures: this is their profession; but, unhappily, their practice corresponds but ill with it.

In respect of holy scripture, Christians seem to have fallen into a state very similar to that of the Jews in the time of Christ. The Jews believed that the books of the Old Testament contained the revelation of God's will, and were ready, at all times, to dispute about them and for them; to settle philosophic and speculative opinions by them; to interpret the dark prophecies, and explain the deep mysteries contained in them: and so high did they carry their veneration of them, that, lest they should be corrupted, they numbered and carefully noted the sum of the words and letters in which they were written. But to make them the rule of their life, and regulate their conduct by that will of God which they declared, was a matter with which, a few instances excepted, they had little to do.

The example of Pharaoh, exhibited to us by God's hardening his heart, by the miracles he wrought for his conviction, and by withdrawing from him his holy spirit, because he would not suffer his divine motions and inspirations to take any lasting hold of him; by his pronouncing against him the sentence of reprobation, and giving him up to destruction, the Jews perverted, so as to make it of no efficacy to bring them to repentance, but rather to increase their own pride, and harden their hearts in iniquity. For,

Who was Pharaoh? who were the Egyptians that perished with him? Vile heathen, and the objects of God's hatred and wrath. But themselves they believed to be the peculiar people of God—the children of Abraham by Sarah, and the sole heirs of all the blessings of the covenant made with him. If God corrected them for their transgressions, his corrections were but the chastisements of a father. He never would punish them as he did wicked heathen, with blindness of mind and hardness of heart; nor issue the sentence of reprobation and destruction against them.

Nor had the judgments of God upon the Israelites whom he brought through the Red Sea, when Pharaoh and his army were drowned, any greater effect on them. They considered not that those Israelites were the covenanted people of God equally with themselves, being the children of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and heirs of all the promises made to them, particularly of the inheritance of Canaan, whither God was then conducting them: that they had, moreover, personally entered into covenant with God at Horeb, and had been eye-witnesses of all the great things he had done for them, in Egypt, at the Red Sea, and in the wilderness: that, on account of their disbelief and distrust of the power of God to put them in possession of Canaan, occasioned by the report which the spies, whom Moses had sent to view the country, made of the size and strength of the inhabitants, "God swear in his wrath," that not one of those who were numbered when they came out of Egypt, Caleb and Joshua excepted, should obtain that promise, but should all die in the wilderness; condemning them to forty years wandering in it, till that curse of reprobation should be fulfilled on them. Nor had the goodness of God any effect on them, so as to correct the perversity of their heart. Like Pharaoh, they closed their eyes against his miracles, and regarded not the interpositions of his providence in their favour, till neither miracles nor providential interpositions could do them any good. At Marah they complained of the bitterness of the water, and were relieved from their distress by the goodness of God, who directed Moses to cast the bough of a certain tree into it, and the water became sweet. Shortly after they murmured in the wilderness of Sin, and demanded bread and flesh for their hunger. Again the power of God relieved them by a miraculous supply of quails and manna. It was not long before they repeated their murmurings for water at Rephidim; and so violent were their clamours, that Moses thought himself in danger of being stoned by them. The rock in Horeb, smitten by the rod of Moses, in obedience to the direction of God, supplied them with water to satiety.

Thus they went on during their abode in the wilderness, ever complaining, never satisfied: and though always relieved from distress by the power of God, yet still doubting that power: still doubting whether God was with them, though they saw daily manifestations of his presence, and had beheld his glory visibly displayed on mount Sinai—wishing they had died by the hand of God, with full stomachs, in Egypt, rather than to be left to famish in the wilderness.

God saw the irreclaimable hardness and baseness of their tempers, and he swore in his wrath that they should not enter into Canaan. Their professions of penitence and submission were ineffectual. Their doom was past, and it was literally fulfilled: they all died wandering in the wilderness.

Surprising as it may appear, these instances of the unbelief and rebellion of the Israelites, and of the judgments of God on them, in consequence thereof, never seem to have ceased while they continued a nation; nor in their present dispersed state through the world do they appear to be cured of them. In the time of Christ, they went on in the same way with their forefathers, acting from the same temper and disposition of heart, till the wrath of God broke on them, in the final destruction of their civil and religious polity, by the power of the Romans.

Of that terrible and fatal disaster, the goodness of God had given them long and repeated notice. The old prophets had foretold the event, and called them to repentance, as the only method to escape the vengeance of God: but their predictions they regarded not. The holy Baptist, who, in the power, and spirit, and with the mortification of Elias, came to prepare the way of the Lord, by turning the hearts of the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, preached to them the doctrine and baptism of repentance. He declared that the axe was about to be laid to the root of the trees, and that every tree growing in the garden of God, the church of the Jews, which brought not forth good fruit, should be hewn down, and cast into the fire: that God, the great husbandman of the earth, the especial owner and proprietor of that people, had taken his winnowing fan in his hand, and would effectually clear and cleanse his threshing-floor, by separating the chaff from the wheat; the latter he would gather into his granary, but would burn up the former with fire which none could quench. "Repent," therefore, said he, that ye may escape the judgment of God impending over the wicked; "for the kingdom of heaven is at hand;" the promised reign of Messiah is now commencing.—They believed not John, but reviled him as a mad-man possessed of the devil.

The last proffer of mercy was the preaching of Messiah. All meek and lowly, "he came unto his own" people, these hard-hearted and impenitent Jews: they "received him not." He called them to repentance: they would not repent. He proclaimed the kingdom of God: they refused to enter into it. He declared himself to be sent of God, to open the eyes of the blind, to heal the broken and contrite spirit, to release the captives of Satan, to preach good news of salvation to the meek and humble, to make known the acceptable year of the Lord: they attempted to throw him down a precipice for his presumption. He wrought miracles to prove his divine mission: they ascribed his miracles to the power of the devil. He lived not on particular food, like John the Baptist, but ate and drank the food of other people: they blasphemed him as a glutton and a drunkard. In strong allusions and apt parables, he warned them of the impending rejection of God: they contrived his death.

In this state of obdurate impenitency were the inhabitants of Jerusalem, when Jesus, for the last time, approached it. The prospect of the city, the knowledge of what it was to endure, filled his eyes with tears, his heart with sorrow, his mouth with the most plaintive words of commiseration: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings," and thou wouldst not! "If thou," Jerusalem, "hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes." And "behold your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, ye shall not see me henceforth."

But no warning had any effect. The declaration of Jesus excited their malice; the acclamations and hofannas of the multitude inflamed their passions. They seized him as a malefactor, and crucified him by the hand of the Romans. The little flock of chosen disciples and followers whom he left in the world, they persecuted and murdered, or scattered abroad among the nations, because they declared his resurrection, and preached repentance, remission of sins, and eternal life in his name.

Thus they continued provoking God, and increasing the heavy load of their guilt, till the Roman army, the terrible scourge of God, cast a trench about Jerusalem, and compassed her round, and kept her in on every side, and laid her even with the ground, and her children within her, not leaving one stone upon another; because she knew not the time of her visitation. For had she known, even at the last, in the days of Christ, the things that belonged to her peace; had she then repented of her wickedness, and reformed her manners; had she been convinced by the miracles of Christ, that he was Messiah, the glory of Israel, the light of the Gentiles, the Son of God, the things of peace had still been hers. But,

Against all the admonitions of God she hardened her heart; against the miracles of Christ she shut her eyes; against his preaching she closed her ears. Perfectly similar to the temper and conduct of Pharaoh, and the Israelites in the wilderness, was the temper and conduct of the Jews when Jesus preached among them; and by the same rule did God deal with them, which had directed his treatment of Pharaoh and those Israelites. When neither his providence, nor his miraculous works, nor the motions of his spirit, could do them good, the things which made for their happiness were hidden from them. God gave them up, and their own vain imaginations and reprobate minds took full possession of them. Forsaken of God, and under the direction of so bad guides, they grew more hardened in iniquity, and acted as foolishly, as rashly, as madly, as ever did Pharaoh or the old Israelites. Their end, too, was the same—total destruction from the power of God, executed by his ministers, the Roman army.

It is worth our consideration, whether such a state can possibly be ours, or whether we have some certain security against it. If we advert to the nature of God, it is always the same. He changeth not. He neither is now, nor ever was, any respecter of persons. Human nature, too, is the same it ever was; as weak, and perverse, and obstinate; as liable to error, and wickedness, and hardness of heart, as it was in the days of Pharaoh, or of the Jews. Against the weakness and wickedness of nature we have no security from ourselves: it can only come from God—from the inspirations and strength of his spirit. This spirit is not at our command; it is his gift. To our prayers for it, and compliance with its holy motions, God hath promised to give and continue it to us. It, therefore, becomes our duty humbly to ask it of God, and obediently to follow its holy inspirations. All desires and tendencies to that which is good are from this spirit. If we turn from them, and resist them, disregard the commands and prohibitions of God, and follow the dictates of our own will, we tread in the steps of reprobate Pharaoh, of the Israelites and Jews. In that road we may arrive at a state of wickedness and hardness of heart equal with theirs. If we should, what shall hinder the sentence of reprobation from passing against us, as it did against them, and leaving us to fill up the measure of our iniquity, and perish miserably, as they did?

Writing to the Hebrew Christians, St. Paul brings the example of their fathers in the wilderness to their recollection. They tempted and provoked God, and he swore in his wrath, "they shall not enter into my rest." "Take heed, brethren," saith he, "lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God."

There is, then, in the estimation of the Apostle, both possibility and danger of Christians falling, through unbelief, under the same sentence of reprobation with the unbelieving and hardened Israelites, whom God disinherited of the land of Canaan, and sentenced their carcases to fall in the wilderness. (Num. xiv. 12, 29.) And the way which the Apostle points out to avoid so miserable a state is, "To-day, if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts, as in the provocation. For some, when they had heard, did provoke." (Heb. iii. 11, 12, 15, 16.)

The voice of God now speaks to us by his providence, by his word, by his ministers, by his church, by the inspirations of his holy spirit, who putteth into our hearts good desires, and excites and strengthens us to bring them to good effect. If we stifle the voice of God speaking to us and in us, we do just what the Israelites did—we harden the heart against him.

From comparing together the conduct and declaration of Christ, it will appear, that he most earnestly desired the conversion of the Jews, even when he pronounced the doom of Jerusalem. The similitude he useth, drawn from the affection of the hen to her chickens, and the tears which he shed, are proofs too strong to be doubted. And that Jerusalem might savingly have known and done the things which belonged to her peace, in the days of the visitation of Messiah, is most certain. It is also clear, that she could thereby have escaped the judgments that were hanging over her, on account of her infidelity and wickedness. Otherwise the tears of the blessed Jesus could not have been the tears of commiseration and love.

No eternal decree of reprobation had, therefore, been passed against her. If there had, Christ's wishing that she had known the things of her peace, would have been contrary to the will and decree of the Father, which is impossible: the will of the Father and of Christ being always one and the same. God the Father had, therefore, the same affection for Jerusalem—the same earnest desire of the conversion and return of the Jews to him, which Christ had. He had laid no bar in the way of their happiness. Nor is there any intimation that either their wickedness or their destruction was in consequence of any eternal decree of God: and what does not appear can be no rule for our judgment or practice.

They might have been sheltered under the divine protection, as the hen shelters her brood under her wings, but they would not. They might have seen the things which belonged to their peace, but they would not. They might have repented at the admonitions and calls of God: they might have regarded the providence, and grace, and miracles of God; but their obdurate hearts were made insensible by long-continued habits of sin, and they would not. The sentence of reprobation then passed on them, and they were given up to vanity and destruction.

Whether Christians who suppose an eternal decree of reprobation from God against Pharaoh, the old Israelites, and the Jews in the time of Christ's ministry; by which they were predisposed to wickedness, and their hearts hardened in iniquity, that they might become fit objects of punishment to display the justice of God to the world; do not run into an error which will preclude these examples from being of any use, may be left to the determination of every reasonable man. For if a person is reprobated from eternity, neither these examples, nor any thing else, can do him good against the decree of God: and if he be not so reprobated, the examples of Pharaoh, the Israelites, and Jews, if we suppose them to have acted under such a decree of eternal reprobation, are utterly inapplicable to him.

“Whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning; that we, through patience and comfort of the Scriptures, might have hope.” The instances of God’s goodness, and mercy, and long-suffering, which he hath caused to be recorded, are intended to teach us repentance and faith, and reliance upon him. The instances of his justice and judgments against wicked persons and nations, are designed to shew us the danger of sin, and impenitency, and unbelief; that, encouraged by his promises, and the great things he hath done for his servants, and deterred by his threats, and the severe punishments he hath inflicted on impenitent sinners, we might be kept in faithful obedience to his will, and in humble penitence for all our sins and errors; and, finally, by his mercy, be received, through Jesus Christ, to eternal felicity in the future world,

DISCOURSE IV.

PART THE FIRST.

OBSERVATIONS ON DAVID'S NUMBER- ING THE PEOPLE.

2 SAM. xxiv. 1. And again the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he moved David against them, to say, Go number Israel and Judah.

HE who readeth history for the sake of the story only, will probably profit but little. The causes of events, the circumstances which attended them, the consequences which followed from them, must all be regarded and considered with candour and attention, or we shall gain no instruction for our own conduct, but only fill our heads with the vain knowledge of facts of no significancy or importance to us.

The natural tempers and passions of men are the same in all countries, and have been so in all ages. The only difference that can arise must be in the manner of their exertion: and though, in this respect, education and the habit of the country may cause some variety, yet, under similar circumstances, their effects will be nearly the same. History, therefore, if we duly regard it, and compare our own situation with it, will give us the most useful lessons to regulate our own conduct. By pointing out the errors and vices of other ages and countries, and the misfortunes which were consequent on them, we shall be taught the necessity of avoiding their crimes, if we would escape their disasters. By bringing their virtues to open view, and displaying the prosperity of which they were productive, we shall be instigated to imitate their virtues, that we may partake of their felicity.

For, whatever may be the sentiments of worldly wisdom, or the dictates of perverted reason, virtue and vice will have contrary effects, and produce contrary states: happiness, especially in a national view, will attend the former as its natural companion; while disappointments and misfortunes, wretchedness and misery, will be the never-failing consequences of the latter. This is the order of our nature; nor hath human policy ever been able to counteract it, or make a vicious nation long prosperous.

If this be the use of history in general, more especially must it be so of those historical accounts of particular nations and men which are recorded in the Bible. No good reason can be given why God hath caused them to be written, but that they might serve as examples to us of his dealing with men, according as they obey or transgress his laws which mark the distinction between virtue and vice; and to convince us, by sensible facts, that virtue, that is, obedience to him, will be rewarded with his approbation and blessing; while vice and immorality perpetually bring his chastisements on those who live impenitently in them.

For the dealings of God with particular nations and men, as they are recorded in the Bible, are not to be considered as relative to them only, but as instances of the rule of God's dealing with the whole world of mankind. As he dealt with them, so will he deal with us, and with all others. His infinite knowledge and wisdom can see and distinguish the variations of their situation from ours; and his justice, which nothing can evade or corrupt, can exactly proportion his blessings or judgments to that variation. As none can escape the observation of his all-seeing eye, so none can escape the retributions of his righteous and unerring providence.

The histories of the Bible deserve also our regard on another account, of the highest importance to us. Human histories often give partial and interested accounts of facts, conjectural and wrong causes of events: they pervert or falsely represent the consequences of particular transactions, as infirmity, or ignorance, or party motives shall direct.

But the histories of the Bible are not human, but divine compositions: they are intended for our admonition and instruction, and were written by men inspired by the spirit of God. Truth must, therefore, be their characteristic. No wrong causes, or partial representations of events, or of their effects, can reasonably be apprehended, or charged on them, without arraiging the knowledge and veracity of God.

Not only the good qualities and actions of men eminent for their sanctity, but their mistakes, and errors, and wilful transgressions of God's law, are registered; that being, by them, made sensible of the weakneses of human nature, and of the corruption and deceit of our own hearts, we might not be tempted to rely solely on our own strength, or trust to our own reason and judgment to guard us against sin, but to his grace and holy spirit who made us, and who must forever be the source of all holiness in us, as well as the strength of our life and the rock of our salvation.

The repentance, too, of some renowned servants of God, when they had fallen deep into sin, by great and wilful transgressions, is noted, and the gracious pardon of God consequent on their repentance, is pointed out, to encourage us to return by repentance to our duty, when it is our unhappiness to sin against our heavenly Benefactor.

The Bible, also, lays before us instances of national repentance and reformation of manners, and of their efficacy to avert the judgments of God impending over communities of wicked people.

To these may be added the remission, or suspension of punishment, upon the appearance or profession of repentance, which the Bible exhibits, even when those professions did not prove to be sincere, but only the effects of present apprehension of threatened judgments; to convince us that there is mercy with God for the penitent offender; that he is more ready to pardon, than we to repent; to suspend, or lay by the execution of his vengeance, when the purposes of his goodness can any otherwise be accomplished, than we are to ask so great a mercy of him.

With these sentiments let us attend to the history which the text introduceth to our notice—David's numbering the people of Israel. The history is a remarkable one, and full of interesting circumstances and events. To draw such observations and inferences from it, as may tend to set the transaction in its true light, and, at the same time, direct our judgments, regulate our opinions, and form our practice into the habits of humble dependence on God, and absolute submission to his will, must be highly beneficial to us.

Weakness, and ignorance, and error are the state of our nature, and, by our own abilities, never can be remedied. On the strength, and judgment, and will of our all-gracious Creator, we may rely with full confidence: they are infinite, and therefore perfect. They are in union with infinite wisdom, and goodness, and truth: they, therefore, cannot lead us into error, or folly, or any thing that can hurt us.

The history begins with informing us, that “the anger of the Lord was again kindled against Israel, and he moved David against them, to say, Go number Israel and Judah.”

From comparing this account with the account of the same transaction in 1 Chron. xxi. we find a remarkable difference in two particulars; one respecting the person who moved David to have the people numbered, the other respecting their number delivered in by Joab, to whom, as being the commander of the army, the management of this business had been principally committed.

In the text it is said, the Lord moved David to this deed. In 1 Chron. xxi. satan is said to have excited him to it. In Samuel, the verb moved hath no nominative before it. Our translators have made the Lord the antecedent to the pronoun he, and to be the mover of David; and have, in the margin, put satan, probably because he is mentioned in Chronicles. By this mean they have left the matter doubtful, whether the Lord or satan excited David to this offensive purpose. The proper rendering, and David was moved, without specifying by whom, would have avoided so unseemly a difficulty. Nor would it have been discordant from the meaning of the expression in the Chronicles, where satan is said to have moved him.

The Hebrew word satan means an evil accuser, a wicked seducer, a malicious enemy, and does not always signify the devil, or prince of darkness; except in a general or remote sense, as he is the author of all evil, and the perpetual instigator to the commission of sin, being the enemy of God, and of all goodness.

We have the authority of an Apostle to say, that as "God cannot be tempted with evil," so "neither tempteth he any man. But every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust," his perverse and corrupt will, "and enticed." That this was David's case, many circumstances in this history render it more than probable. Of this evil disposition, Satan, the adversary of goodness, availed himself, and urged him on to the full perpetration of his vain-glorious and foolish project.

Perversity of will is generally attended with obstinacy; and so intent was David on this ill-judged business, that the remonstrances of Joab, and the generals of the army, could not divert him from it.

How Joab, a man of no scrupulous conscience, and who did not use to give up his views, because base and foul actions were necessary to accomplish them, came to see and be alarmed at evil consequences in this matter, which had escaped the observation of David, no direct account can be given. We know, however, that when the mind is strongly set on any matter, it is apt to overlook all circumstances, and disregard all consequences which may interfere with the accomplishment of its purpose. Though of a religious and devout temper, and, in the general course of his life, anxiously solicitous to study and fulfil the law of God, to live in deep humility before him, and in absolute dependence on him, David, in this case, saw not the pride, and arrogance, and departure from his confidence in God, which lurked at the bottom of the business.

Whether Joab considered it in a religious or in a political view, it was disagreeable to him, and to the principal officers of the army. In terms less haughty than he had been accustomed to use to his king, he remonstrated against the measure;

but he remonstrated in vain: "Why doth my Lord require this thing? why will he be a cause of trespass to Israel?" The king's word, however, prevailed, and Joab and his associates were obliged to set out to execute his command.

It is probable this business had been debated in council; and that some evil adviser, having gained an ascendancy over David, to flatter his vanity, and ingratiate himself with him as a friend of his power and grandeur, had put him on this wild scheme, and carried it into effect, against the more prudent opinion of Joab. This evil counsellor, whoever he may have been, was that satan, or adversary who moved David against Israel; and he got that name from the fatal effects of the advice he then gave.

The other difference which we find between the books of Samuel and Chronicles, respecting this transaction, is in the numbers delivered in by David's officers. In Samuel the whole sum is one million and three hundred thousand; in Chronicles it is one million five hundred and seventy thousand. The difference is two hundred and seventy thousand. To account for this difference, the Jewish authors say, that the standing forces of the kingdom, consisting of twelve courses of twenty-four thousand each, making together two hundred and eighty-eight thousand men, are reckoned in Chronicles, but not in Samuel.

This solution still leaves a difference of eighteen thousand. It is, however, not uncommon in the Bible, to use round numbers to express large sums, if they come near the truth, without regarding minute precision.

If this solution be not deemed satisfactory, I know of no other but the supposition, that the person who, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, transcribed the Chronicles, committed some mistake in the numeral letters. What makes this conjecture the more probable, and that the number in the book of Samuel is the preferable reading, is, that the number in Chronicles seems rather extravagant if compared with the extent of the country, and the persons who were the objects of the king's command.

The country, by the best accounts, was not more than one hundred and eighty miles in length, and about ninety in breadth. If the people who were unfit to bear arms were to be counted, no good reason can be given why Joab and the generals of the army were sent on this business. We are, besides, expressly told that the tribes of Levi and Benjamin were not numbered.

Under these circumstances, it is not probable that Joab's return should have exceeded thirteen hundred thousand men. Even this number will make the inhabitants of the country to have been seven millions of people; full enough for the extent of it, even though it was very fertile, and fully cultivated.

To determine precisely in what the crime of numbering the people consisted, hath given much trouble to commentators.

Some have supposed that it lay in the omission of collecting the half shekel which the law directed every man to pay on such occasions, but which was now forgotten by David. But it seems improbable that a person so well versed in the law, and whose general life had been devoted to religion and piety, should have been ignorant of this circumstance, or have carelessly neglected it, had the law required it. It is also strange that there should have been no person of knowledge or piety enough to have given him proper information in this matter.

But, in truth, it does not appear that this half shekel was to be demanded, except when the people were numbered on a religious account, to make provision for the service of God, in building or repairing the tabernacle or temple. (Exod. xxx. 13—16.)

Others have supposed that David showed an evil heart of unbelief, respecting the promise of God to Abraham, that he would multiply his offspring till it became like the stars of heaven, and like the sand of the sea-shore—so great that it could not be numbered. But it should be remembered, that out of regard to this very promise, David attempted not to take the number of the Israelites who were under twenty years old; “because the Lord had said, he would increase Israel like to the stars of heaven.” (1. Chron. xxvii. 23.)

The pride and vanity of a heart corrupted by power and wealth seem to have excited David to the foolish and vain-glorious project of knowing the full extent of his military strength—how many armed men he could bring into the field.

His army, indeed, was his principal dependence, if he was to look for support and security only to an armed force. This appears from his being obliged to give up the attempt of removing Joab from his post of chief commander of it, lest the affection of the soldiers for the man, and their attachment to his military character, should have occasioned fresh internal commotions, or have dissolved the whole frame of his government.

Yet I call this project of numbering the people a foolish one, because he had no enemy to contend with: the whole country, from the Euphrates to the Mediterranean, was in quiet subjection to him: and nothing was so likely to excite the jealousy of his neighbours, as seeing him pursue measures which indicated some military expedition.

I call it vain-glorious, because it was useless in itself, and injurious to his people, by putting them to great and needless expense, by sinking them deeper in irreligion and disregard of God, lessening their dependence on him, and leading them to place it on the warlike character of their king, and the number of his forces.

To form some good judgment of the expense and trouble to which the people were put, let it be remembered, that when Joab and the other generals went out to number the people, “they passed over Jordan, and pitched in Aroer.” This seems to imply that they there encamped, and called the people to them from the neighbouring cities and country: and this, probably, was their practice through their whole progress; namely, to fix on some convenient station, where they could be well accommodated, and there assemble the people about them.

The people were to bear the expense of travelling, and the loss of their time and labour. Many would come together with them through idleness and the lust of curiosity, and the scene would generally end in dissipation, riot, and debauchery. And, indeed, we learn from the book of Chronicles, that Joab grew tired of the business, either from the expense and trouble which attended it, or from the scenes of confusion which ensued—"the king's word was abominable unto him," and he left off to execute it, before he had numbered either Levi or Benjamin.

To make a true estimate of David's crime, we must recollect that God had raised him from a private station, to be the head and king of his people: That he had preserved him in many difficulties, and delivered him from dangers in which human help could have been of no avail: That he had given the neighbouring nations into his hand, and made him the most victorious and renowned monarch of his time.

God had also been very gracious to his better part, his immortal soul. He had given him an ingenuous, strong, and religious mind; had endued him with many and extraordinary gifts of his holy spirit; had established him to be a prophet, and made him an eminent type of Messiah, the Redeemer of the world.

Nor had David been always insensible of the goodness and grace of God to him, nor unmindful of his power to save by many or by few, and to give the victory to whom he pleased. Many devout expressions of this kind occur in his Psalms; many ardent thanksgivings and praises to God, for his marvellous goodness, and for the astonishing deliverance he had granted him. "I will not," saith he, "trust in my bow; it is not my sword that shall help me; but it is thou that savest us from our enemies, and puttest them to confusion that hate us." And, with regard to his spiritual state, he saith, "O come hither, and hearken, all ye that fear God, and I will tell you what he hath done for my soul."

And yet, when pride and ambition assailed him, he could forget all the great things which God had done for his soul; could renounce his dependence on him whom he had ever found to be his strength, a very present help in trouble; and could build his hope on the number of his troops, and place his confidence in mortal men.

That this temper should be displeasing to God, will not appear strange to those who consider the absolute propriety which he claims in the human heart. This David was plainly taught in the writings of Moses, which directed him to love the Lord his God with all his heart, and with all his soul, and with all his might; to cleave unto him, to fear him, and serve him alone, all the days of his life. Whatever, therefore, withdraws the heart from him, and leads men to place their confidence on any thing besides him, must be offensive to him, as it becomes his rival, and shares in that honour, and worship, and love, which are due to him alone.

But David was not singular in his defection from God. The history informs us, that “the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel,” and that David’s being moved to number the people was the occasion of bringing the judgment of the plague on them.

It would be impious to suppose that the anger of the Lord was kindled against them without reason; or that he should punish the people of Israel because David their king had fallen into a state of defection from him. We must, therefore, conclude that some general corruption of religion or manners, which made them equally culpable with David, in the sight of God, had provoked him to send that mortal plague upon them, by which both David and his people were equally punished.

In what this general corruption consisted, must be left to probable conjecture to determine: The history says nothing of it. That it was not in the external profession of their religion, seems highly probable, from the great care which David took to keep the Israelites in the worship of the true God, according to the law of Moses.

But that great corruption of manners may subsist, where no great fault is to be found with the external form of religion, is evident from what we know does happen under a religion, the sanctions of which are vastly greater than were those of the religion of Moses, and extend into eternity.

The spoils of the countries which David had conquered, and the tribute they yearly paid him, must have made Judea very rich. To this must be added the immense profits of that extensive commerce which he opened, and successfully carried on, from the ports of the Red Sea, after he became master of its coasts.

The vices commonly attendant on great wealth, are pride and arrogance, luxury and sensuality, injustice and oppression; and, as strange as it may appear, covetousness is oftener the consequence of wealth than of poverty.

That great wealth should produce the same effects among the Israelites, that it ever has done among other nations, is not surprising. Nor can we hesitate to believe, that the vices which accompany worldly prosperity became common, if not general among them, when David himself, celebrated for his religion and piety, and for every virtue that can adorn the monarch or the man, was infected and corrupted by the baneful influence of power and wealth.

Sixteen years before the commencement of the history of which we are now treating, according to the chronology of the Bible, David so far forgot his own dignity, his justice to his people, and his duty to God, as to be guilty of the two crimes of adultery and murder, aggravated by deliberation, and by a stupid acquiescence under their guilt for nearly a year. By the affecting parable of the ewe lamb, Nathan the prophet, whom God sent to reprove him, reclaimed him to a due sense of his heinous crimes, and of the dreadful situation he was in, while exposed to the wrath of God, justly incensed against him.

Deep and bitter was his repentance. In mercy God forgave the penitent, so far, at least, as the law was concerned which required death for both adultery and murder. Some have interpreted the words of the prophet, "thou shalt not die," as an absolution from eternal death or punishment; and I see no good reason to exclude this sense of them.

However, as by his offences David had wickedly and wilfully transgressed the commands of God; had thereby furnished the enemies of God and religion with an opportunity of ridiculing and speaking evil of the purity of the divine law; and as David stood in need of the corrections of mercy to recover him to amendment of life, and greater watchfulness for the time to come, Nathan adds the denunciation of severe judgments to the declaration of God's mercy.

Of these judgments, the unnatural rebellion of his son Absalom was one. That rebellion, and the civil war that ensued, were heavy calamities to both David and his kingdom. As his people partook in his punishment, we must suppose they partook with him in guilt: if not in the guilt of the same crimes, yet in the guilt of crimes that were similar, and which equally withdrew the heart from God.

No sooner was Absalom's army routed, and himself slain, than another revolt broke out under Sheba, the son of Bichri, which, though of no long continuance, was of a most alarming nature in the then disordered state of the country.

These civil commotions, the object of which was to dethrone David, must have been a severe judgment on him, especially as they owed their origin to the wickedness of his own son—a son whom he tenderly loved, and to whom he had ever been particularly indulgent. Indeed, a faulty indulgence to his children seems to have been a principal weakness in David. And probably it was owing to this indulgence, that several of them behaved so much amiss in the latter part of David's life.

Be this as it may, it does not appear that these civil commotions, which must have greatly affected the people, not only by slaughter in the battle against Absalom, but by the licentious destruction of private property, had any influence to reclaim the Israelites from their wickedness. For not more than a year after, God visited them with famine for three years, year after year; a sure proof that they were unamended by his former judgments.

Nor does the famine seem to have had greater influence upon their impenitent hearts, than a destructive civil war had produced. For before the country could possibly recover itself from the distress of the famine, even the next year after it ceased, behold “the anger of the Lord was again kindled against Israel; and David was moved to say, Ge number Israel and Judah," which brought a destructive pestilence on them.

However equal David and the Israelites may have been in guilt, it seems necessary to distinguish between his crime and theirs. They appear to have been sensual and voluptuous, forgetful of God, unmindful of religious and moral obligations. In short, they seem to have sunk so deep into that state of spiritual insensibility, which worldly prosperity is ever apt to produce, that it was hard for the judgments of God to reclaim and bring them to a better mind.

Though David's heart may have been equally corrupted by worldly prosperity, the evil dispositions of his heart, which excited him to have his people numbered, appear to have been pride and ambition. These filled him with vanity and the spirit of false glory; they debauched him away from his God; they made him forget the great things that God had done for him; they puffed him up with self-confidence; and led him to place his trust on the number and valour of his troops, and to look to them for safety and protection, for victory and conquest over his domestic and foreign enemies.

From the example of the Israelites we may learn the great danger of a rich and prosperous state in this world. Its natural tendency is to seduce the heart from God, and to lead men to place their greatest happiness in bodily pleasure—in the mere gratification of their animal nature. It tends also to harden the heart in covetousness and usury, in oppression, and to steel it against the soft and heavenly emotions of mercy and charity. And when it hath wrought its full effect, and its contagious influence hath become general, it never fails to bring down the judgments of God in vengeance on the guilty.

From the example of the Israelites we may also learn, that when guilty nations are not brought to repentance, and reformed by the judgments of God, his judgments will be repeated; and they generally follow close upon each other. In the course of six years the Israelites were visited with civil war, with famine, and with a dreadful plague and mortality.

From the example of David we may learn, that no vigour of body, however great—no mental abilities, however excellent—no religious attainments, however exalted—no eminency of virtue, however conspicuous, can, in this life, place us above the weaknesses of nature, or guard us securely against its corrupt desires. To live with caution in a vain world, in the constant practice of that denial of our evil passions and tempers which our holy religion requires, and in full submission to the will of God, whose strength is our only security, is alone the foundation of virtue and happiness to all rational nature.

If we survey David's character and state, we shall find him to have been a prophet, to whom God revealed himself by his spirit, and made known the wonders of his grace, and the designs of his mercy to the children of men. We shall see him growing up from childhood, under the immediate and sensible display of the providence of God in his favour, till he was fixed on the throne. We shall perceive him to have been preserved in his exalted station by the same almighty hand which raised him to it. We shall behold him eminently exemplary in the worship of God; particularly studious to learn and do his will; and so deeply sensible of the power, justice, goodness, and mercy of his Creator and Preserver, that it was the great delight of his life, to celebrate and declare these attributes to the world, in hymns and psalms of adoration and praise. Yet, under all these advantages, he fell, even in advanced age, from his dependence on his God, and weakly made the strength of his armies the confidence of his heart.

From his error learn wisdom. Confide not in your own strength, nor let worldly prosperity seduce your hearts from God: but, “trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not unto thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths.”

DISCOURSE IV.

PART THE SECOND.

OBSERVATIONS ON DAVID'S NUMBER- ING THE PEOPLE.

2 SAM. XXIV. 12. Thus saith the Lord, I offer thee three things; choose thee one of them, that I may do it unto thee.

WHEN Joab had delivered in the number of the people, David's heart smote him at the recollection of what he had done. His vain disposition of pride and self-confidence gave way to the principles of duty and conscience. He recollected his dependence on God; and his heart, deeply wounded by the reflection of his defection from him, burst forth in expressions of penitence, and petitions for mercy and pardon: "I have sinned greatly in that I have done: and now I beseech thee, O Lord, take away the iniquity of thy servant, for I have done very foolishly."

The history informs us of the reason of David's compunction—how he came, at that time, to fall into that state of godly sorrow which worketh repentance. By the direction of God, the prophet Gad went to him the morning after the number of the people had been given in, to expostulate with him on the great wickedness of his conduct; to represent to him the danger of the state into which he had fallen; and to inform him that the hand of God was stretched out to correct him.

This circumstance will furnish some considerations worthy of our attention.

The first is the prevalence of good principles and religious habits.

More than nine months had been employed in taking the number of the people. If we consider that the business was disagreeable to Joab, and to the other generals, and that they gave it all the opposition in their power, it will appear highly probable that some time passed between its being first mentioned in council, and its being carried into execution. We must, therefore, suppose that a full year had elapsed since the beginning of David's defection.

All this time he seems to have continued bolstered up by his vanity, and insensible of the provocation of his conduct to the justice of God. Yet, no sooner was his error and wickedness pointed out to him by the prophet, than he forcibly felt the folly and sin of giving way to the pride and vanity of his heart, and he meekly humbled himself before God.

This can be attributed to nothing but the prevalence of good principles in which he had been educated, and the influence of the habits of religion in which he had lived. He had sinned greatly; he had continued in his sin for a year, and had stifled or disregarded the checks of conscience; yet his heart was not hardened; it was still susceptible of the impressions of divine grace, and felt the full force of the prophet's admonition.

To regard and reverence the pious and virtuous principles which the care of our parents and instructors hath instilled into our minds, and to habituate ourselves to the constant practice of all religious duties, ought to be the great care, the earnest endeavour of our lives. Where these are wanting, there seems to be nothing to which the grace of God can apply itself; no handle by which his spirit can take hold of us: growing old in sin, and daily sinking deeper in hardness and impenitency, we shall leave no chance for amendment, but through the bitter process of calamity and suffering: and the history of Pharaoh, the obstinately impenitent king of Egypt, ought to convince us, that even this process may be vain and ineffectual.

There is another consideration closely connected with this, which ought to be attentively regarded by all those who wish to preserve a consistency in their conduct, and their conscience void of offence—the duty of parents and instructors to fix deeply the principles of virtue and religion in the minds of their children and pupils.

In the days of Solomon it was wisdom to train up a child in the way he should go; and one benefit expected from it was, that when he was old he would not depart from it. What, in the time of Solomon, was practised as wisdom, seems now to be neglected as folly. External accomplishments are regarded, and some attention is paid to those qualities which fit a man to make a figure in the world, and to acquire its riches and its honours. But religion, which is to reconcile offending man to his Creator, and prepare him to live in happiness with him in another, an eternal world, is little regarded; as if man were to live in no world but this; as if all the happiness his nature is capable of receiving, were to be obtained in this miserable, changeful, and perishing scene of his being; as if his very existence were to end with his life in this world, and he must look for no more.

The present mode of education, and the example set by people of mature age, can only impress young persons with the opinion, that they are to expect all their happiness from the vanities of the world, or the enjoyments of this life: we ought not, therefore, to be surprized if human life be spent in the sordid acquisition of the riches of the world, or a servile courting of its honours. The necessity of living in the denial and mortification of the evil tempers, and passions, and appetites of our nature, according to the religion and example of the holy and mortified Jesus, that we may be fitted for the enjoyment of God's kingdom in heaven, where only the true happiness of our nature is to be obtained, seems almost to be disregarded: little care is taken to impress it by instruction, or to enforce it by example. Indeed, it does not appear to affect parents much, whether their children be happy or miserable in the next life, provided they make a figure, and live in splendour in this. And, perhaps, one great cause of the decay of religion, of which the serious people that are left among us complain, is, the unrestrained, undisciplined, uninformed manner with regard to religion, in which the youth of both sexes are suffered to grow up.

Carelessness and inattention may be causes of this negligence in religious instruction: but the true reason seems to me to lie deeper, and to be founded in system.

An opinion hath prevailed, that all religions are equal—all alike acceptable to God; that it ought to be the choice of a man's own heart, and not dictated to him by others; that, therefore, it is wrong to impress any religious opinions on young minds; but that they ought to grow up to maturity in a perfect vacuity of religious sentiments, that so their religion may be their own proper choice, uninfluenced by any human authority of any kind whatever.

If the opinion, that all religions are equally good, and equally acceptable to God, be admitted, there will need but little sagacity to prove that no religion is as good as any; and that a man of no religion at all is equally in favour with God, with the most serious, devout, and faithful Christian.

The design of religion is to reconcile sinful man to his holy Creator, that he may be happy with him—happy in his happiness. Nothing, therefore, can be of any efficacy in religion, but as it is the will of God. The contrivances of one man, of ten thousand, of a million of men, must be vain and insignificant. We know not that God will be satisfied or pleased with them; consequently they can be no ground of a reasonable faith, or of a sure hope.

The will of God must, therefore, be sought after, as the ground of all our religion, of all our faith, of all our hope and expectation. And, as it cannot be known by us, but by revelation from himself, to the study of his revelation we must apply ourselves, with honest and upright hearts, uninfluenced by prejudice or party views, if we would approve ourselves to be reasonable men. To the study of divine revelation, we must add the honest efforts of our own lives, to obey punctually the will of God therein made known to us, and to let our conversation be such as his revelation requires.

Though we should allow that every man is to exercise his own judgment in this matter, and is ultimately to be governed by it; yet it ought to be remarked, and he ought to remember, that if he judge wrong, he does it at his own peril; God requires that he judge right, and hath given him abilities and capacity to do so. When I say ability and capacity to do so, I mean not to leave out instruction and information, whether of God's church or ministers, or of religious and well-informed people; much less would I be thought to exclude the necessity of divine grace, the motions and inspirations of the holy spirit of God.

That man hath natural ability to discover spiritual and religious truths, I do not believe. Instruction is, therefore, necessary for him; and, provided it be drawn from its true sources, and rightly proposed to him, he hath ability and capacity to receive it. The foundation of all religious instruction is the revelation of God contained in the Holy Bible, and thence his church and ministers ought to derive all that they require as necessary to salvation.

If, then, religious instruction be necessary for all men, it must be necessary for young people; and, therefore, ought to make a part, and a principal part, of the education of our children: they will otherwise grow up in ignorance of their highest good, or catch only such religious principles as they find floating among those with whom they converse. The necessity of religion is great; it includes the certainty of man's being accountable for his actions, and lays the only sure foundation of morality and virtue.

Since, then, our gracious Creator hath made known his will to us in his holy word, and hath laid open the whole process of our salvation, so far as it is necessary for us to understand it; that we may reap the full benefit of it, it becomes our duty, and will be our inconceivable benefit, to study it seriously and honestly, to frame our religious sentiments by it, and to frame our conversation according to it.

And that our children may not grow up in ignorance of that eternal world on which they must soon enter, and in which the goodness of God hath taken all pains to make them perfectly happy; nor be left a prey to those wild and false religious systems which at present do, and probably ever will, beguile the minds and understandings of well-disposed people; but may obtain and be happy in the knowledge of salvation and hope of glory which we enjoy; it becomes our reasonable duty to educate and instruct our children, and all under our care, in the full knowledge and practice of the will of God, which the holy Scripture hath made known to us, and to confirm them fully in the faith and habit of it, by our own exact and conscientious example.

Among the other great benefits of a religious education and habits, this will not be a small one; that, should the strength of appetite or passion, the vanities of the world, the corrupt tempers of their own evil nature, lead them astray from their duty, the good principles and religious habits in which they have been educated will ever serve as a probable ground on which to hope for their amendment, and recovery to the practice of virtue and religion.

In so important and arduous a business, it would be folly to trust entirely to our own ability and sagacity. He must have lived a very little while, or very carelessly in the world, who is not fully convinced of the ignorance and weakness of his own mind, as well as of the evil tendency of his own passions and tempers. It is, therefore, natural to suppose, that he will, with a ready mind, avail himself of all the collateral helps which the goodness of God hath provided, to make him acquainted with his will, and enable him to do his duty. The instructions of the church and ministers of God will, therefore, be ever regarded as matters of great importance to explain the will of God in the holy Scriptures, and point out and enforce the practice of christian duty.

Above all things, the well-informed Christian will ever look for aid and support to that divine grace which God hath promised to all who conscientiously strive to obey him—the motions and inspirations of his holy and blessed Spirit, the author of every good thought, and without whom no worthy purpose can be brought to a happy issue. Remembering the words of the Lord Jesus, that God will give his holy Spirit to those who ask of him the precious gift, they will humbly bow the knee before him, and ask, and seek, and knock, that they may obtain and ever keep the presence of that almighty and glorious Being, to support them in all difficulties, and direct them in all circumstances of their lives.

To return from this digression :

The second consideration respecting God's sending the prophet Gad to expostulate with David, relates to the method he took to recover him from his dangerous condition.

God had waited till David had completed his vain-glorious purpose ; and he seems to have waited that David might have time to recollect himself, and return to his duty ; or, if he did not, that he might be deprived of all excuse and palliation of his crime. He then sent his ordinary and standing

Minister to him, to reprove and admonish him—the prophet Gad, David's seer; the prophet who attended on him, was his spiritual director, and, as it were, his domestic Chaplain.

Hence we may learn, that God regards his own Ministers; and, except on those extraordinary occasions for which he sees best to provide in an extraordinary way, useth their ministry to effect the purposes of his mercy and goodness towards his servants.—We ought, therefore, to reverence the Ministers of God, to receive their admonitions with candour and patience, and to consider them as acting by the authority and in the name of God, for our good.

Whether Gad had made any remonstrance before this time we are not told. Possibly he saw no chance of succeeding, or his admonitions were ineffectual. He now came, however, not only to admonish and reprove, but armed with the terror of divine threats positively denounced: “Shall seven years of famine,” said the holy man, “come unto thee in thy land? or wilt thou flee three months before thine enemies, while they pursue thee? or, that there be three days pestilence in thy land? now advise, and see what answer I shall return to him that sent me.” 2 Sam. xxiv. 13.

In 1 Chron. xxi. 12. only three years famine are mentioned. As that agrees better with the three months pursuit of enemies, and three days pestilence, than the number mentioned in Samuel, the reading in Chronicles seems to be the preferable one. Critics have endeavoured to reconcile these two places, without supposing any error in the number of either of them. They imagine that the three years of famine which the country had suffered, on account of the Gibeonites whom Saul had destroyed, are taken into the account in the book of Samuel. That famine had ceased, probably only partially, but one year. If those four years be added to the three mentioned in Chronicles, they make the exact number, seven, mentioned in Samuel.

So serious a message as was delivered by Gad touched David's heart. No room was left for evasion—no hope to escape from him with whom he had to do. In this extremity, he cast himself upon his goodness and mercy who willeth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should repent and be saved.

Be the example of David kept ever fresh in our minds: and when it is our unhappiness to offend against the divine Majesty, let us not seek for palliations and excuses; nor endeavour to throw the blame on others; nor charge it on the times, on our particular circumstances or mode of life; nor on any thing else; but, with meek and penitent hearts, acknowledge our own vileness, and entreat the pardon and mercy of God.

This was the method which David pursued: and God so far regarded his penitence, that his iniquity rose not against him to his final condemnation. Yet his defection had been so great, and of so long continuance, that infinite goodness saw it necessary to punish him in this world; and to punish him in such a way, as that the pride of his heart should be effectually humbled, and his foolish confidence in a numerous host brought utterly to nothing.

This is the second instance which the history of David presents to us of God's dealing with him in this manner. Against Uriah David sinned greatly, and continued long in his iniquity—a whole year, without compunction. God then sent Nathan the prophet to him, at that time his seer. By an artful parable of the poor man and his ewe lamb, Nathan brought David to condemn himself with his own mouth: “As the Lord liveth,” said David, “the man that hath done this thing”—hath violently taken from the poor man his solitary ewe lamb—“shall surely die. And he shall restore the lamb four-fold, because he did this thing, and because he had no pity.” “Thou art the man,” replied the holy Prophet; “thou hast killed Uriah the Hittite with the sword, and hast taken his wife to be thy wife. Now, therefore, the sword shall never depart from thine house. Behold,” saith the Lord, “I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house, and I will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour.” 2 Sam. xii.

So dreadful a declaration had its full effect on the offender. His heart felt its force: it felt also the horrible gulph of perdition into which it had fallen. Deeply humbled by penitence and a sense of guilt, his lips refused not to utter the bitter compunction which oppressed his soul: “I have sinned against the Lord," was the short, pathetic confession he made to the Prophet. "If we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins." "The Lord also hath put away thy sin; thou shalt not die," was the gracious answer of consolation, which the mercy of God, by the mouth of his Prophet, vouchsafed unto him.*

"Thou shalt not die," God had said. Grateful are the words of mercy. Grateful to the penitent heart is the forgiveness of God. The previous threat, however, remained in its full force. Bitter is the cup of vengeance; but the cup of vengeance is oftentimes the cup of mercy; and the same mercy which forgave David's sin, obliged him to drink deeply of the wrath of God, in the rebellion, shameless conduct, and death of his son Absalom, whom he tenderly loved; in the abuse of his daughter Tamar; in the vile behaviour and death of his son Ammon; and in the attempted usurpation of his son Adonijah, which ended, at last, in the death of violence also.

It is, indeed, of the mercy of God that he corrects sinners in this life, and does not treasure up their iniquities against the day of wrath, when he will render to every man according to his deeds. Thus God in mercy dealt with David: and as his mercy was not confined to David, but is extended over all his works, we have every reason to believe that he deals thus mercifully with us also.

That we need the correction of God, and deserve the chastisement of his fatherly hand, there can be no doubt. And though I would not encourage the opinion, that all the calamities and misfortunes which happen to men are judgments upon them for their sins, yet no mortal can be sure that none of them are so. All the evils we endure, all the evils of nature, are the consequences of sin. No one, therefore, can tell, but that the losses, and sicknesses, and accidents that befall him, are corrections from God, to bring him to repentance and a better mind, that he may not be condemned with the evil world.

* On this occasion, it is supposed, David wrote the 51st Psalm.

It certainly would do us no harm, to consider in this light whatever personally happened to ourselves, without extending the same opinion to others. As dispensations of God's providence to us, we certainly must consider them, and we ought to regard them, as calls from him to "consider our ways"—to "break off our sins" by repentance—to abate the pride of our hearts—to abandon our confidence in worldly prosperity—to turn to him in holiness of life—to devote ourselves to him, and to make him the hope of our heart, and the confidence of our life forever.

The message of the Prophet had thrown the penitent Monarch into deep distress, and that was not a little increased by the proposal he had made. Hard was the alternative to choose between a long famine, a disastrous war, or a mortal pestilence—the "three fore judgments" of God. How should a king who loved his people determine which to take?

That the weight of either of these judgments would fall on the people, is evident; and that it would do so, was probably the source of David's distress. It looked as though he singly had pulled down the wrath of God upon an unoffending nation. But let us not judge hastily. God is just, indeed, to punish sinners: he is just, also, to spare the innocent.

Had the Israelites been innocent, their innocence, no doubt, would have been a shield of protection to them. Had David been the only guilty person, his punishment would have fallen individually on his own head. That they were not innocent, but had been partakers in David's crime, appears from their being made partakers in his calamity.

Let us remember that they were men like ourselves, subject to the same tempers and passions that we are: that having lived long under a prudent and warlike monarch, who had extended their dominion over all their neighbours, and enriched their country by conquest and by commerce, their hearts were lifted up with the pride of national prosperity, and they vainly considered great armies of disciplined men as the glory of their king, the foundation of their happiness, and the surest defence of their country.

Nor let it seem strange that, under their circumstances, they should fall into those evil habits which I formerly mentioned—luxury and intemperance, injustice and oppression, covetousness or the love of money, forgetfulness of God and disregard of religion. These are the crimes to which national prosperity so surely leadeth, that no nation ever rose to any high degree of power or wealth, without being tainted and corrupted by them.

They probably had looked on their late civil commotions as the mere effect of Abfalom's ambition; and on the late famine which distressed their country, as the particular punishment of Saul's wickedness in destroying the Gibeonites; but on neither as the chastisement of God for their sins: and yet no good reason can be assigned, why they should suffer famine for Saul's crime, after he was dead, unless their sins, as well as his, had called the vengeance of heaven on them.

Continuing unreclaimed, it became necessary that the divine goodness should continue its correction, and send other judgments, more severe and more destructive, till they perceived and revered the hand from which they came, and were brought to repentance and amendment of life.

The perplexity into which David was thrown by the offer made to him by the Prophet, broke out in the most affecting exclamation—"I am in a great strait"—I know not which to choose; for, choose which I will, the consequence will be most dreadful. A due sense of God's mercy fortunately interposed, and determined his choice: "Let us fall now into the hand of the Lord, for his mercy is great, and let me not fall into the hand of man."

In this determination, David seems to have left it entirely with God, to visit him either with famine or pestilence; for he deprecates neither of them, but earnestly begs that he might “not fall into the hand of man”—under the power of his enemies; to flee three months before them, while they pursued.

The reason he assigns is both a religious and a prudent one; the Lord’s “mercies are great,” and he believed, that in the midst of his judgment he would remember his mercy. But from men, from the neighbouring nations, no mercy could be expected, should he become exposed to their malice, or subjected to their power. Their countries had been overrun, their fortified cities demolished by his victorious armies. Eagerly would they seize the opportunity of satiating their revenge, and returning that havock and desolation on Israel which they had experienced from them.

Besides; to a king and a conqueror, nothing could be more humiliating than to flee before an enemy whom he had often vanquished; to be chased by those whom he used to pursue; to receive the law of conquest from those nations on whom he had formerly imposed the yoke of subjection.

To this mortification, the consideration of another circumstance of no small importance must be added—the diminution of military strength which must happen in the slaughter of a three month’s pursuit—the ravaging of the country—the captivity of the people—and the demolition of fortified cities.

Whatever may be thought of the phantom of military glory, these are real and distressing evils, from which the country would not recover, but by time, and care, and expense. And as to the security of large and disciplined armies, much would that be lessened by their reduction, and more by the dejection of spirits which must ensue from so long and desolating a calamity. How would those men who were left ever recover their military confidence, or dare to look an enemy in the face from whom they had shamefully fled?

Prudently, therefore, as well as piously, did David determine, when he committed himself and his people to the correction of God's own hand, rather than endure the unrelenting malice of enraged and victorious enemies. God, he knew, would correct not to destroy, but to reform; and though he punish for a time, he would "turn at the last, and be gracious unto his servants."

Be this our comfort in all our distresses; in all the afflictive dispensations of God's providence—that his mercies are great—that he does not willingly afflict the children of men—that though his goodness may see it necessary to correct them for their sins in this life, it is not to destroy but to reclaim them, by taking off their confidence from this world, and fixing it on himself, who alone is able to preserve them from the distresses of this life, and from the ever-during anguish of sin and guilt in the life to come.

Let us, then, place our confidence where it is due; and, renouncing all dependence for happiness on the world, its riches, its pleasures, its power, its highest and most prosperous state, let us look to him who made us; in whom we live; from whom we receive all that we enjoy; in whose hand is the management of all things, the disposal of all events in time and in eternity—God Almighty—the only and all-gracious source of happiness to all his creatures.

DISCOURSE IV.

PART THE THIRD.

OBSERVATIONS ON DAVID'S NUMBERING THE PEOPLE.

2 SAM. XXIV. 15. So the Lord sent a pestilence upon Israel, from the morning even to the time appointed; and there died of the people from Dan to Beer-sheba, seventy thousand men.

DAVID had no sooner made his determination to Gad, by requesting to “fall into the hand of the Lord, and not into the hand of man,” than God, in whose hand are the issues of life and death, of sickness and health, sent a pestilence on Israel, through their whole country, from one extremity to the other: and so severe and mortal was the disease, that it killed, in a few hours, seventy thousand men. That the pestilence began the very morning on which Gad came to David, and immediately on David’s making his election of one of the three judgments which the message of the Prophet had offered to his choice, is evident: but how long it continued doth not so certainly appear.

According to our Bible, “the time appointed” for its continuance seems to be three days; and yet there is, from the history itself, strong reason to suppose it did not continue one sixth part of that time. For if we look to the history, no night will appear to have intervened, from the delivery of the message of the Prophet, to the making of the atonement at the threshing-floor of Araunah—all seems to have been transacted by the light of one day.

When David chose to fall into the hand of God, and not into the hand of man, it was because the Lord’s “mercies are great.” Had the pestilence continued the whole term of three days, there would have been nothing in the event to answer the strong faith and confidence which David placed in the mercy of God. For though God might have been merciful in not inflicting more judgments, or severer ones, or in limiting the continuance of the pestilence to three days, there would have been no mercy shown in mitigating the sentence denounced; and yet that was evidently the mercy in which David confided. “The Lord’s mercies,” said he, “are great, and, therefore, he trusted he would not extend the execution of the dreadful punishment to its utmost limit: and so firm a faith, so implicit a confidence in the mercy of God, surely found some return from infinite goodness.

We are informed by the history, that when the Angel, who executed the divine decree, stretched out his hand over Jerusalem, to smite it with the pestilence, “the Lord repented him of the evil, and said to the Angel that destroyed the people, it is enough: stay now thine hand." Had the plague continued three days, it would have run its full course, and could not, with any propriety, have been said to have been stayed: nor could it have been said, that "the Lord repented of the evil," if the full term of time allotted to that evil was fulfilled in the execution of it.

To solve this apparent difficulty, the Hebrew critics have observed, that the word which we have translated, "the time appointed," is often used in the Hebrew Bible to express, the time appointed for their religious assemblies. They, therefore, understand, that the plague continued from the morning to the time appointed for offering the evening sacrifice—the ninth hour of the day, according to the Jewish reckoning, answering to our three o'clock in the afternoon. So that the pestilence was, by the mercy of God, stayed about the middle of the afternoon of the same day on which it began.

If we suppose Gad to have attended on David at eight o'clock in the morning, it is probably as early as the ceremony of a court would permit: one hour may be allowed for his conference with the king; and then the plague began at nine: from nine to three o'clock in the afternoon are six hours. Or, if an earlier hour, six in the morning, be allotted for Gad's attendance, or for the beginning of the plague, there will be but nine hours till it ceased.—Fully, therefore, did the event justify the pious faith and holy confidence of David, when he said, "Let us fall now into the hand of the Lord, for his mercies are great."

I know nothing that can reasonably be objected to this interpretation, unless it be drawn from what is said of God's repenting. Should it be thought to ascribe levity of will to Almighty God, and that to change the decree he had once made, through pity and an unwillingness to see men suffer under the infliction of those judgments which his wisdom and goodness had determined to be best for them, argued weakness in the divine nature; I beg that what was said concerning the purpose of God when he inflicts punishment on sinners in this world, may be brought to remembrance—God punisheth, not to destroy, but to reform.

If, indeed, he should see that no chastisement would produce amendment, but would harden instead of reclaiming, it ought to be no wonder, if the sentence of excision should pass against the guilty person or nation. For why should God continue to correct, if correction do no good? Why punish, if punishment only harden the heart in iniquity, and enhance guilt?

The judgments of God in this world (and with them only are we at present concerned) are intended to support his moral government; to convince the inhabitants of the earth that he is the Maker, the Preserver, the Governor of all things—the Lord God Almighty—the only object of adoration, the only source of happiness; and also to vindicate the justice, and equity, and mercy of all his ways to man.

Suppose, now, the judgments of his providence to have no effect in reforming an obstinately impenitent person or nation; suppose further, that he sees they never will have such an effect: why should not that person or nation be cut off? why should they be left to corrupt others, and bring reproach on the justice and government of God? What reason can be given, why he who is the Lord of life and death, should not remove them from the earth, in such manner, and by such means, as in his wisdom he sees best calculated to answer the gracious intentions of his goodness to the works of his hands?

“Why should you be stricken any more?” said Isaiah, in an after period, to the nation of Judah; “you will revolt more and more: the whole head is sick and the whole heart faint.” No good principle, it seems, was left by which to mend them; no sense of duty to God on which his judgments could operate to reform them; no sentiment of piety, no wish of holiness remaining, on which the divine and almighty Spirit of God could lay hold, to bring them to repentance and a better mind—“From the sole of the foot even unto the head, there was no soundness,” nothing but the incurable “wounds, and bruises, and putrefying sores” of sin and impenitency.

That this was the case of Pharaoh, the obdurate king of Egypt, we know from his history. The more he was corrected, the more he revolted; the more he was punished, the more he refused correction, till destruction swept him away. Such, also, was the case of the inhabitants of Canaan whom the armies of Israel drove from their country. The measure of their iniquity was full: they were ripe for destruction, when the vengeance of God was executed on them by the arm of Joshua. And such, at last, was the case of unhappy Jerusalem.

Ever ready was God to bless and protect his beloved Israel, to strengthen them in prosperity, to build them up in happiness; but they renounced that virtue and piety, they rejected that religion and fear of God, on which alone happiness can be built. They refused correction; they hated to be reformed; they became irreclaimably hardened in sin; and the sentence of God passed against them. "O Jerusalem! Jerusalem!" cried the meek and gracious Saviour of the world, "how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate."—And desolate was it made by the Roman armies. Wherever the Jews were, there the eagles gathered together, and flocked round them, and preyed upon them, till they were utterly consumed.

Nor must we think that any thing singular happened to the Jews or old Canaanites. Similar judgments of God put an end to the empire and power of the Babylonians, Assyrians, Tyrians, Carthaginians, and many other old and later nations; and, at last, to the all-conquering Romans, to whom most of the nations of the European and Asiatic world have succeeded.

God is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. His nature changeth not, nor do the maxims of his government alter. He is still the sovereign Ruler of the universe, and still his judgments are in all the earth. If the modern nations of the world follow the vices of antiquity, and tread in the steps of their enormous corruption, abandoned principles, and profligacy of manners, they must partake in their punishment also—"except they repent, they shall all likewise perish."

But when the chastisements of God answer the purpose for which they were sent, by producing repentance, and such amendment of life as God will accept, their end is accomplished: of course they will cease; for should they continue, they would no longer be punishment; they would become cruelty.

That the pestilence which God sent on the Israelites did produce its proper effect—did bring both David and his people to a true and penitent sense of their wickedness and guilt before God, we have a right to conclude from the event—"God repented him of the evil, and said to the Angel that destroyed the people, it is enough; stay now thine hand." The end of the pestilence was answered. With penitence and humility, with weeping and mourning, they bewailed and renounced their sins, and turned unto the God of their salvation.

But there is more than the bare event on which to build this opinion.

When David received the message of Gad, he became sensible of his sin in numbering the people, and deeply penitent on account of it. We shall do no violence to the nature of God, nor bring any charge against the justice of his government, by supposing that, if David had been the only person concerned, his sin, upon his sincere repentance, would have been passed over without punishment. And, in truth, we do not find that the judgment of the pestilence fell particularly on him or any of his family. But David was a public person—the head of his people. They had sinned, and the anger of the Lord was kindled against them. It was, therefore, necessary they should be brought to repentance—reclaimed from their evil ways to a sense of their duty; and, in their suffering, David suffered also.

Whether we suppose that Gad left David after his conference, or, as seems to be most probable, continued with him, there can be no doubt that the compunction of heart his message had excited, remained strong upon him—so strong, that he appears to have assembled the Elders of the people—the Sanhedrim probably of Jerusalem—and to have clothed them, with himself, in sackcloth, to deprecate the threatened vengeance of God.

For, the next circumstance recorded is the visible appearance of an Angel in the middle region between the heaven and the earth, having a drawn sword in his hand stretched over Jerusalem, to smite it with the pestilence. When “David and the Elders of Israel, who were clothed in sackcloth,” in token of their deep humility and contrition for their sins, saw the Angel, they "fell on their faces." 1 Chron. xxi. 16.

Here is every appearance of holy fear, firm trust, humble resignation, and unfeigned repentance, both on the part of David and of the Elders, that possibly could be shown. It was such as God was pleased to accept, and to stop the progress of the destroying Angel. Not that God had changed his purpose—His purpose was to reform, and bring home to himself the nation of Israel, which had, like lost sheep, erred and strayed from him. But the nation had changed its state, and the purpose of God was accomplished in their repentance.

One circumstance of David's conduct, noted in sacred history, is particularly affecting. When he saw the Angel in the act of smiting Jerusalem, being conscious that the people, through the country, were momentarily falling by premature death inflicted by the vengeance of God, the thought that they suffered through his fault rushed on his mind, and pierced his heart with unutterable grief. Like a good man, the father as well as the king of his people, he considers himself not as the partner of their wickedness, but as the only offender. To God, in whom he trusted that he would mitigate the sentence he had pronounced, he addressed the sentiments of his contrite heart: "Lo, I have sinned, and I have done wickedly." I commanded the people to be numbered: "but these sheep, what have they done?" Few, if any of them, were concerned in that fatal business. "Let thine hand," O Lord, "I pray thee, be against me, and against my father's house;" but not against thy people.

Nothing can give greater pain to a religious mind, than the consciousness of having led others into sin: the deepest contrition, the bitterest sorrow, will ever attend the full sense of it. But when this mortifying recollection comes home to a person in high office, a king, a governor, a ruler, a director of the people, to any one who ought to be an example of goodness to others, double will be the portion of its bitterness.

Judge, therefore, of the pangs of David's heart, how sharp, how severe, how humiliating they must have been. Instead of checking the licentiousness of his people, and restraining them within that line which their holy religion marked out for them, he had set them the example of pride and self-confidence. Instead of setting before them a pattern of temperance, sobriety, and self-denial, he had carelessly left them to riot, after his example, in the sensuality of luxury and dissipation. Instead of teaching them dependence on God for protection and safety, he had led them to rely on the military character of their king, and to trust to the number and valour of his armed men.

Of these circumstances David must have been conscious; and, when he saw the people fall by the wrath of God, in a pestilential disease—a disease brought instantly on them by the pride and vanity of his own heart; that consciousness pierced his mind with pangs too great for utterance, and almost too great for mortality to bear.

He knew—what every observer of the state of human society must know—how great the influence is, how widely extended the example of men eminent in station or character: that their sentiments would be adopted, their manners imitated, their conduct in life copied, and followed by those who were able, and by many who were unable to bear the expence: that no human wisdom or foresight could reach the extent of the operation of such a power, or see where its effects would cease: that, let the example be such as coincided with the corrupt passions and tempers of human nature, it would descend from rank to rank among the people, till the whole community was corrupted and debauched by it.

Such reflections must have occurred to David: and as he knew his own example had not, in all instances, been such as became his station and character, either as a king, or a servant and prophet of God, they must have added greatly to the anguish of his mind for his foul offence. He now saw evidently the truth of a position, which he probably had ever owned in theory, though he had not always regulated his practice by it—that great sins, in which we long continue without repentance, will not fail to bring the judgments of God upon the guilty.—This he saw, and this he felt.

Be this a caution to all men, not to let their influence and example be a snare to others, and lead them into sin; lest the bitterness of David's repentance, if not the weight of his punishment, become theirs. We are not kings nor governors;

but every man has some degree of authority or influence. Be that authority and influence employed to restrain licentiousness and vice, to enforce the practice of virtue, to recommend the duties of religion to all with whom they converse. They will thereby escape the horrid guilt of leading others into sin, secure to themselves the conscious approbation of their own hearts, and have the approbation and favour of God for their reward.

The history informs us, that there died in this pestilence seventy thousand men.

Remarkable was the procedure of divine justice in this matter, and highly worthy of our most serious regard; and happy will it be for us, if it make so deep an impression on us, as to regulate our practice through life. David prided himself in the number of armed men he could bring into the field: on them he placed his confidence; and that ill-placed confidence seduced his heart from God. And, behold, of those very men on whose number and valour he relied for protection; who, he hoped, would be ample security against all his enemies; seventy thousand are, in a few hours, swept away by the blast of God's displeasure.—Vain are all dependencies when God is not with us—idle are all expectations that are not derived from his power and goodness.

Nor is this true in military affairs alone, or in the concerns of kingdoms and states. It is equally true in all the businesses and occupations of life. When we manage them according to the will of God, and in humble dependence on his goodness, they are in a right train, and we may cheerfully hope for his favour and protection. But if we leave him out of the account, and trust to the creatures of his hand, to the exertions of our own strength, or contrivances of our own wisdom for happiness, or security against the evils of life, we do just what David did when he numbered the people.

And mercifully would God deal with us, if he reclaim us to our duty by trouble and affliction; if he bring us home to himself by pain and sorrow; if, to convince us of our dependence on him, he strike away the props of all worldly hopes from under us, and oblige us to catch at him for support.

No sooner had the Angel, at the command of God, stayed his hand which was stretched out over Jerusalem, than Gad, by order of the Angel, (Chronicles) directed David to "go up and build an altar unto the Lord in the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite." On this altar, as the sequel informs us, David offered burnt-offerings—offerings of expiation and atonement for sin; and peace-offerings—offerings of thanksgiving to God for his goodness in regarding the contrition and penitence of his people, in accepting an atonement for their sin, and in staying the hand of the Angel of destruction.

St. Paul hath remarked, that, "without shedding of blood, there is no remission" of sin. (Heb. ix. 22.) The meaning of St. Paul is, that the law knew of no atonement, had appointed no expiation for sin but the blood of some animal, slain as a substitute for the offender. He hath also said, "It is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins;" and, we may add, of any other animal, by any power or virtue of its own. Yet, if we trace this matter up, we shall find that bloody sacrifices—the taking away the life of some animal, by shedding its blood as a sacrifice of atonement for sin, were ever in use, till after the coming of Christ; not only under the law of Moses, and among the Jews, but prior to that law, and among all nations.

By the history of the Bible, sacrifices may be traced up to within a little while after the defection of Adam. And as it is confessed that they are unnatural and unreasonable, that is, could never have been dictated either by reason or nature, we must refer them to the institution of God. Of this institution, the most probable time is, when God gave the promise of a Saviour to Adam and Eve, under the character of the bruiser of the serpent.

This Saviour, in process of time, came into the world, and made atonement for sin by sacrificing the fallen nature of Adam, subjecting it to death, the threatened penalty of his transgression. Of this sacrifice of Christ once made, all animal sacrifices made according to the institution of God, were typical, and from it borrowed all their virtue. But the true sacrifice of atonement having been made and fully completed by the shedding of the blood of Christ, the animal sacrifices which were typical of it, and looked forward to it for virtue, and efficacy, being fulfilled in their archetype, of course ceased, and were done away. In their stead, the old thank-offering of the fruits of the earth remains in the Church of Christ—bread and wine—broken, offered, and sanctified to be a memorial before God of the death of his Son for sin, to thank him for all the benefits of his death, and to make all faithful receivers partakers of them. Therefore is this sacrifice of the church stiled the Eucharist—the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving. And as all the bloody sacrifices of animals looked forward to the sacrifice of Christ, as being types of it, so the sacrifice of the Eucharist looks back to the same sacred and blessed event, as to the great original, of which it is the representation, and from which it draws all its virtue and efficacy.

To return—It was remarked, that by sending the prophet Gad, David's seer, to deliver his message to him, God gave us an undeniable proof of his regard for his own ministers: here he hath given us the same proof of his regard for his own institutions. He had accepted the penitence and humiliation of David and the Israelites, and had commanded the Angel of death to stay his hand; yet he would do honour to the instituted means of atonement. By his Angel he ordered Gad to direct David to build an altar, and have the accustomed sacrifices offered for sin, in a place of his own immediate appointment.

I note this latter circumstance, because the tabernacle and altar on which the Israelites were ordered to offer their sacrifices of atonement, were then at Gibeon, and on the present emergency out of their reach: to obviate that difficulty, God interposed his own direction. 1 Chron. xxi. 20.

Hence one lesson may be learned; and I hope it will be thought an important one—not to despise the institutions of God—not to neglect the ordinances of our holy religion. That God can bless us and save us without them, I well know. The question is, what he hath promised to do?

That God could have saved the Israelites from the pestilence, without the altar and sacrifices in the threshing-floor of Araunah, there can be no doubt. Nay, the destroying Angel was restrained; the pestilence was stayed. Yet, I presume, every person will suppose with me, that, had David refused to build the altar and offer the sacrifices according to the divine direction, because God could save without them, because the pestilence was already stayed, because he could not see the reason and necessity of them, the Angel would again have employed his destructive sword in executing the decree of his Master.

Thoughtless man asks what necessity there is for prayer, for public worship, for sacraments? God knows our wants whether we pray to him or not, and can save us without prayer, and worship, and sacraments, as well as with them; and such is his goodness as well as power, that we may rest assured, he will do so.

The dispute is not about the goodness or power of God, what he can do; but what he hath promised he will do, and what he requires us to do.

Public worship is intended to recognize God as the Creator, Preserver, and Sovereign Ruler of all things; thereby to preserve and strengthen our faith, and hope, and trust in him, as our almighty protector, most merciful preserver, the author of all good, the fountain of all happiness. Of these sentiments and tempers, love and obedience will be the natural consequence: it is, therefore, necessary that they be produced, and ever growing and increasing in us, that our love and obedience may be as full and perfect as the state of humanity will permit.

The sacraments of the church, and the prayers of the closet have the same tendency; they also mend the heart, by increasing those divine tempers and devout affections for which we pray, which we commemorate, and on which we meditate in the holy sacraments. By increasing these tempers and affections, we shall increase our disposition and endeavour to live in them; we shall strengthen the sense of our dependence on God, and prepare ourselves for a greater and more ready reception of the graces, motions, and inspirations of the Almighty Spirit of God, the beginner, the promoter, the perfecter of every thing that is, or can be good in man.

To speak more particularly of prayer—To suppose that the design of prayer is to prevail on God to alter his plans, and to deal with us, not according to his own wisdom and goodness, but according to our weak and often ill-judged petitions, is an idle whim, and ought never to enter the head of a reasonable man. God will ever do what is right, both to us and to all his creatures, whether we pray to him or not. If prayer produce in us holy, and divine, and heavenly affections, and excite us to live a holy, heavenly, and divine life, it opens the way for God to treat us as persons possessed of those affections, as leading that life; to give us many good things suitable to our state; particularly, more manifold gifts and graces of his Holy Spirit, which, were those divine tempers wanting in us, would do us no good, because we should make no use of them.

The effect of prayer is, therefore, to change and mend our own hearts, to alter our state toward God, to make our tempers and lives more holy and heavenly, and thereby to prepare and enable us to receive and comply with the motions and inspirations of his Holy Spirit in us; not to alter and change the purposes or designs of God towards us, which ever are to do us good by all the means which infinite power, and wisdom, and goodness, and love, can exercise.

“God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.” If, therefore, we wish to receive the grace of God in our hearts, we must empty them of all pride, and we must live in all habits of humility. The proud heart is too full of its own importance to admit the grace of God into it. It is only with the humble soul, empty of vain, self-aggrandizing views, that his grace and spirit can dwell. To obtain this state, prayer is a principal instrument. To pray for humble sentiments, exerciseth them, and enforces the necessity of living in them; for it would be a shame, not to live as we pray—not to exercise, in the daily habits of our conversation, those sentiments, desires, and tempers which dictate our prayers. Now, whatever sentiments and habits are in continual exercise, will grow and increase in strength: this is the order and state of our nature.

All Christian virtues are in the same state with regard to us, that humility is in. If the heart be full of the opposite vice, they neither can grow, nor enter there. Constant and earnest prayer will have the same effect on them all that it hath on humility. It will expel from the heart whatever opposes them; it will produce and increase them in us; it will invite the Holy Spirit to come to us, to dwell with us, to rule and govern our hearts in the fear of God; and it will make us susceptible of all his divine motions, and attentive and obedient to them.

And now let me, in my turn, ask those persons who can see no necessity for prayer and sacraments, because God is good and powerful, and can and will do what is right and best, whether we worship and pray to him or not, why, upon the same principle, not leave off to eat and drink? What necessity is there for either? Man doth not live by them alone, but by the power of God, who can as easily preserve life without them as with them.

Would the man, then, act reasonably who should attempt to live without eating and drinking, because God can support him without food? Full as reasonably as he acts with regard to his natural life, does that person act who expects to live the Christian life without prayer and sacraments, because God can save him without them.

Eating and drinking are necessary for us, because God hath appointed them for the support of our natural life. And prayers and sacraments are necessary for us, because God hath appointed them to be the support of our spiritual life. He who bleffeth his own appointment in the one case, will also blefs it in the other, and make it effectual to the purpose for which he intended it.

It will be our wisdom to follow the directions of God. He who made and redeemed us, knows best what is right for us. To set up our own imaginations, and suppose we know better what is good and proper for us than he does, will be our folly; a folly of which we must deeply repent, or for which we must severely suffer.

DISCOURSE IV.

PART THE FOURTH.

OBSERVATIONS ON DAVID'S NUMBERING THE PEOPLE.

2 SAM. XXIV. 25. And David built there an altar unto the Lord, and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings: so the Lord was entreated for the land, and the plague was stayed from Israel.

WHEN David went up, by the direction which Gad, in the name of God, had given him, he found Araunah, with his four sons, at the floor, threshing wheat. They had seen the Angel in the air, with his drawn sword, threatening Jerusalem; and, terrified at his appearance, had endeavoured to hide themselves. Seeing the king approach, Araunah went to meet him, and bowed himself before him.

The history calls Araunah a Jebusite.—It is to be recollected, that about thirty years before this time, in the beginning of his reign over Israel, David took Jerusalem, whose former name appears from Chronicles to have been Jebus, from the Jebusites, and made it the seat of his royal residence. Most probably the family of Araunah, if not he himself, conciliated the favour of David on that occasion, and were permitted to remain in the country, and retain their possessions.

The Jews had a tradition that he was of the royal family of the Jebusites, and that he became a zealous profelyte to their religion. The latter circumstance is highly probable, and the former one seems to be directly supported by the twenty-third verse of the context—"All these things did Araunah, a king, give unto the king." However this may have been, he certainly was a man of a respectable and religious character, of considerable wealth, and great generosity.

Having done honour to the king, he requested to know the purport of his visit. Being informed it was on a religious account, to purchase the threshing-floor of him to build an altar to the Lord, that an atonement might be made for his own sin, and for the sin of the people, as God had directed, and an entire stop put to the ravages of the pestilence, his heart instantly opened to the soft emotions of religion and humanity. Sensible of the piety of the design, of the urgency of the occasion, of the necessity of obeying God, he wasted not the time in bargaining, but freely gave the floor, the oxen, the threshing instruments, and the wheat, that no time might be lost in providing what was necessary for a work so immediately ordered by God himself. To his generous gift he added his devout prayer for the divine acceptance of David's sacrifice.

Whether we consider the piety, the humanity, or the generosity of Araunah's conduct, we shall find much to admire and praise; and, I hope, on all proper occasions, to imitate. A person, careless of the discharge of his duty to God, would have put no confidence in addresses and supplications to him, and would have been very indifferent whether any altar were built, or any sacrifices offered. Had not the tender feelings of humanity expanded themselves in his heart, he would have cared but little whether the pestilence raged or ceased: his own security would have been all his concern. And, had an avaricious temper governed him, instead of giving without price, he would have seized the occasion with eager hopes of making a good bargain.

The wealth of the king, the pressure of the present circumstances, his threshing-floor the only spot that could fulfil the command of God—all these circumstances would have pressed hard on an ungenerous mind, and tempted it to extort the highest possible price. But no such considerations entered the generous heart of Araunah; with the piety of a saint and the munificence of a monarch, he instantly obeyed the call of religion and humanity.

But, however pious and well intended the generosity of Araunah may have been, it suited not the disposition or situation of David to accept it: he therefore excused himself, and said, "Nay; but I will surely buy it of thee at a price; neither will

I offer burnt-offerings unto the Lord my God, of that which doth cost me nothing."

Let it here be recollected, that David had been ordered to "rear an altar unto the Lord in the threshing-floor of Araunah." The rearing an altar unto the Lord implied the dedication of it—the giving or setting it apart unto the service of God. The dedication of the altar included the dedication of the ground on which the altar stood. While the ground was Araunah's, David had no right to dedicate it: that is, to give it away, by appropriating it to the service of God; nor to build an altar upon it; for no one has a right to give away, or appropriate to his own use, that which belongs to another.

It was, therefore, necessary that David should become the proprietor of the ground before he could, in his own right, dedicate it, or rear an altar to the Lord upon it; and he could become its proprietor only by gift or purchase. As a gift from the generosity of Araunah, he declined to receive it, because of the impropriety of offering to God at the expense of another person; for that would have been the real state of the case, had he accepted Araunah's gift. His offer to give the threshing-floor, and oxen, &c. was not as a gift for general purposes—for David to do as he pleased with it—but expressly for the service of God. The offering, therefore, would have been Araunah's, and not David's: and David, in accepting it, would have been only the instrument of presenting the offering of another—he would have offered nothing of his own.

Besides; had David availed himself of the generosity of Araunah, there would have been the greatest appearance of his wanting liberality in the service of God. It would have looked as though he was glad to save his own property, and caught eagerly at the opportunity of being devout at the expense of another.

There was, therefore, strict propriety in David's conduct. He was directed to rear an altar for the purpose of offering sacrifices of atonement for the sins of himself and the people, that the pestilence might be stayed by the mercy of God. To him the command was particularly given. He was the head of the nation. He considered himself as the principal, the most guilty offender, and he insisted on doing all at his own expense—he would suffer no one to share it with him.

On this occasion David acted in exact conformity with the direction which the Holy Ghost hath given us by the pen of Solomon—"Honour the Lord with thy substance; and with the first fruits of all thy increase;" which the Greek thus renders—"Honour the Lord out of thy honest labours; and pay the first fruits to him out of thy just earnings—out of thy fruits of justice."

Hence it appears, that what a person appropriates to the service of God from the earnings of his own honest industry, is more acceptable to God, than what he hath obtained from the generosity of others.

From the example of David we may draw a lesson of instruction.

The worship of God depends, in this country, on the liberality of christian congregations. The necessary expenses of building and repairing churches, and supporting ministers, may by some be thought heavy. In particular instances it undoubtedly is so.

Under the law of Moses, the precise portion of every man's earning which religion required was exactly ascertained, and it was esteemed by God injustice, and a robbery of him, to detain that proportion from him. If, under the gospel, Christians are left more to the dictates of that liberality which their religion enjoins, it is certainly a very bad reason why they should act a niggard's part with him, from whom they receive all that they have, and on whom they depend for all that they hope; who also hath promised to "honour those who honour him;" that is, to support and take care of those who honourably support and take care of his worship and ministers. And to the afore-cited passage from the Proverbs, "Honour the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thy increase," there is an express promise annexed, of the particular favour and blessing of heaven to the faithful observer of it; "so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine."

If we appeal to observation, either of ourselves or of others, we shall find no one instance of a person's being made poor by his liberality to the religion of God, or in support of its ministers. Whatever hath been expended, hath been amply repaid by the secret, though sure blessing of that munificent Being, who "openeth his hand, and filleth all living creatures with plenteousness." Their store, like the handful of meal in the bottom of the barrel, and the pittance of oil in the cruse of the good widow of Sarepta, the more it was expended, dissipated, exhausted in promoting the glory of God and the salvation of men, the more it has grown, increased, multiplied, they knew not how—multiplied by his hand, who, though he work in secret, works so powerfully and surely, that nothing can resist or defeat his purpose.

If men are attached to this world, and feel no desire of happiness but what arises from it, it is not strange that they should prize their money above all things; that they should be exceedingly careful how they part with it, except to purchase those sensual pleasures they wish to enjoy; that they should esteem their money too precious to be expended in building churches for the celebration of the worship of God, or the support of his ministers; for, from these sources they expect no pleasure, and for heaven they have no wish.

Or, if men who profess themselves Christians, and to have hope in a better life, have suffered the love of this world to smother the efficacy of their religion and hope in God, with worldly cares and troubles, hopes and fears, pleasures and riches—though the support of their characters among their Christian neighbours, or some other worldly motive, may oblige them to do something—what they shall call their share—in support of religion; yet it will be only their share; only what they cannot help, without sinking themselves low in the estimation of others. From their liberality nothing is to be expected. Necessity is their only mover; not the necessity which the command of God imposes, but the support of their own reputation and importance.

Urged by this necessity, they give; but they give grudgingly—their share to a penny—while the mind dwells on all the sums they have given on any occasion, amasses them into one lump, calculates the interest, and reckoneth how much richer and better off they should have been in worldly wealth, had there been no religion or ministers to maintain.

The subject is too invidious to be pursued. To be thus backward in supporting the church and ministers of God, with whatever is necessary for the decent celebration of the homage and adoration due to the Almighty Creator and Redeemer of men, and to the necessities and comfort of his servants who officiate by his authority in the congregations of his saints, shows a total absence of the principles of christianity from the heart. For did they in any degree influence the temper and disposition, they would show themselves in a due attention to those things which so nearly concern the honour of God, and the salvation of men.

It is, moreover, in direct contradiction to the direction of the Apostle, who said, “ Let him who is taught in the word, minister to him that teacheth, in all good things:" plainly declaring the duty of him who is taught the knowledge of salvation through Christ, who is instructed in the will of God which leadeth unto life, and in all the ways of holiness and piety, to minister of his worldly good things to the decent support of his instructor, and to let him want no comfortable thing, whom God hath set over him in the Church, to minister to him the offices and sacraments of religion, and direct him in all his spiritual concerns; that he may be able to attend constantly on his duty, without being disturbed and diverted by the cares of providing for his temporal support.

If we consider the necessity of recognizing the power, dominion, and absolute sovereignty of the Almighty Creator of heaven and earth, the preserver of all things, the fountain of blessedness to all his creatures, in whom they live, and move, and have their being—the infinite love and goodness of their gracious Redeemer, the adorable Son of God, who emptied himself of the glories of the godhead, and became man, that he might deliver man from the power and curse of sin, and open to him the gate of everlasting life—we must be blind and dead indeed to all spiritual concerns, if we see not the propriety and necessity of Christians meeting together for the purposes of public adoration, on the day which God hath sanctified to himself in his holy Church. Of the necessity of their having some place appropriated for their meeting, there can be no doubt; and, there ought to be none, of the necessity of having this place decently finished, and kept in decent repair, so far as our circumstances shall permit, answerable to the dignity and awful majesty of that august Being whom we adore. To do this will require some portion of our worldly wealth; and that portion, whatever it may be, ought to be paid as a debt of justice, not as the gift of benevolence.

A moderate portion of the pious generosity of Araunah, or of the disinterested temper of David, would be a better direction to us in this case, and a greater excitement to our duty, than the most learned discourse. The one thought nothing too much for him to give for the service of God, when present exigency required it. The other disdained to serve God at another man's expense. Neither of them, it seems, thought the worse of religion because it was attended with expense, nor estimated its value in proportion to its cheapness.

They looked on religion as the dispensation of the love and mercy of God to degenerate, fallen man, intended to lead him through virtue and holiness in this life, to blessedness and glory in heaven. Wearied with the guilt of sin, and sensible of the displeasure of God against those who continued in it, they considered the appointment of bloody sacrifices for its remission as most benevolent in itself, and highly grateful to the guilty heart; displaying at once the wrath of God against the obstinately wicked, and his merciful forgiveness to the penitent sinner.

That particular service which God had commanded for the expiation of the sins which had brought his wrath on the land in a most destructive pestilence, expanded their hearts with all the sentiments of love and adoration towards God, of sympathy and affection towards their fellow-men.

Under these impressions, they were not only content, but earnestly solicitous to give up their worldly wealth to serve so divine a purpose; supposing whatever God commanded necessary to be done; not only because it was his command, but because it would secure the pardon, and promote the sanctification and eternal happiness of themselves and others: therefore their riches became of no estimation. The service of God required them, and they never could be so well expended as in advancing his glory, the good of mankind, and their own salvation.

To return to the history:

Convinced of the propriety of David's conduct, Araunah sold him the threshing-floor and the oxen; and David having built the altar as he was commanded, offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings on it. The atonement for his own sin, and the sin of the people, being made, God showed his acceptance of his devotion, by sending fire from heaven to consume the sacrifices.

The history then concludes with observing, that God commanded the destroying Angel, and he put up his sword again into the sheath thereof—He was intreated for the land, and the plague was stayed from Israel.

It appears, then, that though God had restrained

the Angel from destroying Jerusalem, by commanding him to stay his hand, yet the complete cessation of the pestilence, so as no more to return, did not take place till the atonement was made in the threshing-floor of Araunah, as God had commanded. Till that was done, the Angel stood visibly between the earth and the heaven, over the floor, with the sword of destruction drawn in his hand, and only refrained from inflicting on Jerusalem the dreadful stroke of desolation, by the command of God. How awful the sight! how dreadful the interval! How must every heart have rejoiced, and poured forth its gratitude to God, in acclamations of praise and thanksgivings, when they saw the consuming fire of God, the emblem of his wrath, descend on the altar instead of the city, and the Angel of his vengeance mildly return the sword of destruction into its sheath!

Who can read this part of the story, and not figure to himself that more awful day when the Son of man shall descend from heaven in full glory, with all his holy Angels; not to take vengeance on Jerusalem and the Israelites, but to judge the world? When all who ever lived shall see him coming in the clouds of heaven, as the inhabitants of Jerusalem saw the Angel of vengeance standing in the air over their city?

They were delivered from the destruction of the pestilence, by the atonement made at the threshing-floor of Araunah. We have a more efficacious atonement than the blood of beasts, even the precious blood of Christ, the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.

Only let us be careful to trust in this atonement, to believe in this Saviour, and do all those things which he hath commanded, in order to obtain remission of our sins and eternal life through him; even as David trusted in God, believed his word by his Prophet, and did the things which he commanded for the deliverance of himself and his people from their sin, and from its punishment: then shall we receive a happy acquittal from the mouth of our Judge, when he cometh to judge the earth; and with gratitude and praise far exceeding that which the Israelites felt, when they saw the Angel sheath his burning sword, hear the joyful determination which his all-gracious lips shall pronounce: "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

It is more than probable, that, on this occasion, God revealed to David, either directly by his spirit, or mediately by his Prophet Gad, that he intended to fix his name on that hill; and that his temple, which was to be the place of worship, and the centre of union to all the tribes of Israel, should there be built. For it is said, "When David saw that the Lord had answered him in the threshing-floor of Araunah, then he sacrificed there;" that is, he continued, in after time, to offer sacrifices there; and said, "This is the house of the Lord God, and this is the altar of the burnt-offering for Israel." 1 Chron. xxi. 28. xxii. 1.

It hath been remarked, that, at this time, the altar of burnt-offering was with the tabernacle at Gibeon. Thither David could not go to make the atonement, “because of the sword of the Angel of the Lord,”—because of the raging of the pestilence—and because of the delay which the journey would occasion.

It is certain, that, from the time he became convinced that the hill of Sion, the place of Araunah's threshing-floor, was appointed by God to be the site of the temple which he once had determined to build, and which God had promised him should be carried into effect by his son Solomon; he diligently employed himself in forming the plan of the house; in providing materials for its building, and appropriating money for its expense; in arranging the courses of the Priests and Levites who were to officiate in it, and assigning to every one his proper duty; in directing his son Solomon, and in preparing every thing in his power, which could contribute to the magnificence, beauty, or convenience of the building.

There is little doubt but that the hill of Sion on which the temple was built, was the mount Moriah, where Abraham gave that signal proof of his faith and obedience, in offering up his son at the command of God. David, therefore, must have bought the whole hill, or, at least, so large a portion of it as made sufficient room for erecting the temple and its courts on it.

This view of the matter will open a way to reconcile the disagreement there is between the books of Samuel and Chronicles, with regard to the price which David paid to Araunah in this purchase. In Samuel, the money paid for the threshing-floor and oxen, is said to have been fifty shekels of silver, which, reckoning the shekel at its highest value—three shillings and four pence—comes only to eight pounds six shillings and eight pence. In Chronicles it is said, David gave to Araunah for the place, six hundred shekels of gold. A shekel of gold is estimated at fifteen shillings sterling, or twenty shillings our money.*

I, therefore, conclude that the price mentioned in Samuel relates merely to the enclosure of the threshing-floor, on which David was directed to build the altar. But that when he found that God had accepted him there, by his sending fire from heaven to consume his sacrifice, and by removing the pestilence, and was convinced that God had chosen that hill to himself, to be from thenceforth the seat of his residence with his people, the place of worship and sacrifice for all Israel, the situation of the temple which was to be built to the honour of his divine majesty; he then bargained for the whole hill, or so much of it as was sufficient for his purpose, and bought it for the sum mentioned in the Chronicles—six hundred shekels of gold.

I have now gone through those observations which occurred to me on considering this most affecting piece of sacred history. The Christian reader, I trust, will reap some advantage from them.

* Goodwin's Moses and Aaron.

If they should excite a disposition in him to read the Holy Scriptures with more attention to his own practice, with a view to draw instruction from them for his own conduct in life, as well as support for his faith, and fresh motives to his piety, great indeed will be the advantage.

There is, however, one reflection arising from this subject, which I consider of so much consequence, that I cannot excuse myself from taking notice of it. The character of David is deservedly held in high estimation by all Christian people. His defending his kingdom against its enemies, his enlarging it by conquest and enriching it by commerce, his governing it by justice and equity, his leaving it in full prosperity and glory to his successor Solomon, have conspired to establish his reputation as a worthy man, and excellent monarch.

The attention he paid to the holy religion which God had appointed for the rule of his worship and life; his ready and punctual obedience to all the particular commands which God gave him, which acquired him the character of a man after God's own heart; his intention of building a temple to the honour of the Most High God; the purchase of the ground, and the preparation of materials and money which he made for carrying that design into effect; the divine and elevated compositions of his Psalms; the fervent expressions of devotion, love, faith, holy attention, and deep penitence which are in them; the prophetic insight into the mysterious dispensations of divine grace and mercy through Messiah, the blessings of his atonement, the glory of his church, the salvation to be obtained in it, which they exhibit, have fixed his name as a most religious, devout, and divinely inspired person. God grant that every Christian may receive the full benefit of his example and instructions.

Yet, such is the corruption and weakness of human nature, with all these excellencies, we find his character soiled with very great and foul crimes. His adultery with Bathsheba, his murder of her husband Uriah, are great and aggravated blots in his reputation. They are, however, single blots—he persisted not, either in an adulterous or murderous life. Upon the admonition of the Prophet, such was the goodness of God, he recovered from his dangerous state of deadly sin; he rose from his foul apostasy from God; through the thorny path of bitter repentance, he recovered that state in the divine favour, of which his base sin had deprived him.

To learn wisdom from the folly of others, is one of the highest attainments of human prudence. From this instance of David's folly, let us learn to “abstain from fleshly lusts.” They “war against the soul,” and bring it into captivity to the body of sin and death. They make way for other more grievous sins to enter and deprave the heart; so that he who gives himself up to them, can never foresee the height of wickedness at which he may arrive, nor the depth of guilt into which he may sink. The lust of adultery made way for the malice of murder to enter the heart, and wound the conscience of David.

From him, too, we may learn the nature and efficacy of true repentance. When it is sincere and hearty, it cleanseth the conscience from the deepest stain of guilt, through the merit of that atonement which it hath pleased God to accept for sin, and restores again the sinner to his favour and mercy. It is not, therefore, so much a single act of sin, which excludes us from the grace and mercy of God, as the hardened, impenitent state which a perpetual repetition of sinning—the habit of sin—brings on us. Such habits gradually blind the mind and harden the heart to such a degree, as at last to render repentance and amendment impracticable.

As fleshly lusts drew David into the crimes of adultery and murder, so the natural pride and vanity of his heart led him into the crime of numbering the people. Whether any motions of repentance had stirred in his heart, before the prophet Gad delivered his message to him, is uncertain. In 1 Chron. xxi. 6, &c. Joab is represented as ceasing to number the people, before he had taken any account of the tribes of Levi and Benjamin. The reason assigned is, that the business was “abominable to Joab. And God was displeased with the thing, therefore he smote Israel.” Then follows an account of David’s penitence and confession of his sin, before Gad had been with him. If there be no anticipation in this account, it furnishes a good reason why Levi and Benjamin were not numbered. It also proves that David’s penitence began before the admonition of Gad—his conscience being awakened by some alarming visitation of God upon his people.

However this be, on Gad's admonition his heart appears to have been truly humbled and penitent. His after-conduct, and the conduct of the elders and people, show every mark of real humiliation and penitence. We indeed must judge from appearances, and appearances may deceive us; but God seeth the heart, and cannot be deceived. He removed the plague, and sent no after-judgment on Israel. But,

Supposing David and the elders to have acted hypocritically, or from the impulse of their present fears only, without any lasting change of the heart and sentiments: still I suppose on offering the sacrifice of atonement as Gad directed, the pestilence would have ceased. Had they returned to their former sins, other judgments would have followed; or they would have been left to the dictates of their own blind and impenitent hearts, till they were ripe for destruction.

The reason of my sentiment is this: The judgments of God on public men and nations, are not only intended to produce a national repentance and reformation, but for the open display of the sovereign majesty of God, and of the justice and equity of his moral government to the world, that all men may fear and adore him.

The crimes of David and the Israelites had been open; so were their professions of repentance, and their compliance with the divine direction to make an atonement, by sacrificing in the threshing-floor of Araunah. These appearances were such as all men would judge to be sincere. Yet, if God saw otherwise, the removal of the plague would have tended to establish the authority and justice of his moral government, as well as to make known his goodness and mercy to the world.

There is a case nearly in point in the history of Ahab. If we attend to the character of Ahab, we shall find it a very bad one: "He sold himself to work wickedness, and did evil above all that were before him." When, however, the Prophet Elijah denounced the judgments of God against him for his wickedness, "he rent his clothes, and put sackcloth on his flesh, and fasted, and lay in sackcloth, and went softly." Yet Micaiah, in the next chapter of his history, gives him no better character, but again threatens him with the vengeance of God. Howbeit, such was Ahab's penitential appearance, that the word of the Lord came to Elijah, saying, "Seest thou how Ahab humbleth himself before me? because he humbleth himself before me, I will not bring the evil in his days; but in his son's days will I bring the evil upon his house."

This argument can extend no further than to the open public sins of public men and nations, and to those appearances of repentance which, though insincere in themselves, answer the end of God's moral government in the world. Nor, in that case, can it be extended further than to ward off the present judgment, which probably will be followed by some heavier chastisement.

But for them, or for particular private finners, to suppose there is any efficacy in an hypocritical, feigned repentance; or in that which proceeds from the alarm of present fear, and which permits the sinner to return to his old wickedness, or which excites him only to a partial reformation of life, or to exchange one wicked course for another; to suppose that such hypocritical pretensions can have any effect to conciliate the favour of God, to lessen his abhorrence of sin or their punishment in a future world, is a most vile and fatal presumption: Instead of mitigating, this feigned repentance will aggravate their sin, and add greater weight to the vengeance of God.

No repentance can avail them but that which is hearty and sincere; which reaches to all evil lusts, and habits, and tempers, and produces a real change of heart and life. Such repentance will be founded on faith in God's mercy, and in the merit of that atonement for sin which Christ, "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world," hath made by his own blood.

God grant this repentance to every member of that humanity for which Christ suffered. AMEN.

DISCOURSE V.

JESUS, THE SON OF GOD, THE JUDGE OF THE WORLD, THE OBJECT OF CHRISTIAN WORSHIP.

JOHN V. 22, 23. For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son: that all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father.

THE text brings to our view some of the most important doctrines of our holy religion.

1. The divinity of Jesus, the Son of God.
2. The right of judgment which the Father hath committed to him.
3. The duty which arises from this right committed to the Son; namely, "that all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father."

It is evident that the right or power of judgment committed to the Son, and the adoration due to him on that account, both belong to him because he is the Son of God. It will, therefore, be necessary to ascertain in what sense he is so, that we may submit to him as our Judge, and reverence him as the object of our adoration, not only with the piety of devout Christians, but with the understanding of reasonable men, who know in whom they believe.

A proper attention to the transaction recorded before the text, and to the conversation of Jesus with the Jews, in consequence of it, especially if that conversation be compared with other declarations of Jesus which the holy Evangelists have transmitted to us, will, I trust, ascertain to all reasonable and candid men, what they are to believe and do as Christians in this respect; and with this advantage—that the authority of Jesus will thereby become the ground both of their faith and practice.

At the pool of Bethesda, in Jerusalem, Jesus found a man who had laboured under an impotency of body thirty-eight years, and said to him, “Rise, take up thy bed, and walk.” The words of Jesus were the words of power—the power of God omnipotent operated in them. The man, though before unable to get into the pool without help, rose at the word, took up his bed, and departed.

It was the sabbath day when this miracle was wrought. The Jews, who saw the man carrying his bed, reprimanded him for profaning the sabbath. He, thinking himself fully justified by his order who had made him well, pleaded that order in his own excuse. But not knowing Jesus, he could give no information who it was that had commanded him to take up his bed and depart.

Jesus afterwards found the man in the temple, and said to him, "Behold, thou art made whole; sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee."

It is not likely this man could entertain any malicious intentions towards Jesus, from whom he had received so great a benefit. Gratitude to God for his goodness towards him had probably carried him to the temple, when Jesus found him there; and the same gratitude might excite a wish in him to make Jesus known to the Jews, that they might reverence him as the Prophet of God. Whatever was his motive, he went and told the Jews who had reproved him for carrying his bed on the sabbath day, that it was Jesus who had cured him of his impotency.

Unaffected by the miracle which had been wrought, and which proved that the power of God resided with Jesus, they persecuted and sought to kill him, because he had, as they supposed, profaned the sabbath, by making the man whole, and directing him to carry his bed on that day.

On this occasion, the Jews to whom the man gave the information, seem to have gone immediately to the temple, and directly to have urged their accusation against Jesus. His answer was, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work"—God the Creator hath hitherto preserved his creatures, and doeth good to them on the sabbath day. After his example, who is my Father, I also work, and have done good to this man on the sabbath day.

Instead of appeasing, this answer increased their malice against him. They now sought to kill him, not only for his supposed profanation of the sabbath, but also because he said that God was his Father, thereby making himself equal with God. They, therefore, understood him as calling God his Father in some sense peculiar to himself, and which made him equal with God. Not, therefore, his father by creation; for, in that sense, God is the Father of angels and men, who yet were never supposed to be equal with God; not by adoption, for, in that sense, they supposed all Jews to be the sons of God, yet never imagined them to be equal with him. But if he did not call himself the Son of God by creation, nor by adoption, but in a peculiar and exalted sense which made him equal with God, it must have been the Son of God by nature, equal with God in essence, as every son is of the same nature and essence with his father.—πατέρα ἰδίον ελεγε τον θεόν—he said God was his own, his proper, his peculiar Father, in such a sense as to make him equally God with him—as much so as a son is equally a man with his father.

Should it be said, that this is representing the matter as the Jews understood Jesus, and not as he spake, I answer—The Jews expressed the sense plainly in which they understood him; and through the whole conversation Jesus never once contradicted it, or, in the least, endeavoured to correct any misrepresentation about it. They, therefore, rightly understood him, and rightly expressed his meaning. Nor is there any expression in the discourse which contradicts, or which, when fairly represented, does not comport with the sense in which the Jews understood him; viz. that God was his proper, his peculiar Father, and he himself equally God with the Father.

Nor will it appear strange that the Jews should understand Jesus in this sense, if we consider that they knew and believed that God had one Son equal in nature and essence with the Father. However they came by this knowledge, whether it was the remains of the original revelation of God to Adam, preserved by oral tradition; or whether they had learned it from their scriptures, which certainly contain plain intimations of it; that it could not have been a novel doctrine among them, appears evidently from the following considerations.

Neither Jesus nor his Apostles make any apology for introducing the doctrine of a Trinity, or distinctions of persons in the godhead, as a fundamental principle of religion; but speak of it as of a received sentiment, well understood. They declare Jesus to be the Son of God, but they take no pains to prove that God hath a Son, or give any illustration of the matter. Had it been a new position, it could not have passed off in the manner it did. A people so addicted to their own opinions as the Jews were, so acute in art and management, so disposed to find fault with Jesus and his Apostles, so determined to root Christianity out of the world, or, at least, to prevent it from gaining any credit in it, never would have permitted any religious sentiment to pass uncensured, had it been new or strange, or opposite to the principles of their own religion.

And yet it was not till many years after the New Testament was written, and Christianity had pervaded the world, that they found fault with the doctrine of the Trinity. True it is, they accused Jesus of blasphemy for saying that HE was the Son of God, but never for saying that God had a Son.

Familiar must the expressions, Son of God, and Word of God, have been among them when no censure was cast on the use of them, and no explanation of their meaning demanded: when St. John could write, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God;" and yet have no fault found by the Jews, either with the sentiment or the expression.

When, indeed, they perceived the disposition of the heathen to persecute Christianity, and that the doctrine of the Trinity had given offence to some of the philosophers, the hope of inflicting a deep and fatal wound on the religion of Jesus, tempted them not only to renounce that doctrine, but to give a new, and forced, and unnatural construction to their own Scriptures, which plainly taught it. Then we first hear, that when God said, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness," he spoke to his Angels, or after the manner of earthly monarchs. But, where do we read, or where learn, that the Angels were ever taken into council with God? They are his ministers to execute his commands, not his advisers to direct his proceedings.

And who were the earthly monarchs who gave rise to this mode of expression? When God said, "Let us make man," neither monarch nor man had subsisted on the earth. Besides, the monarchic style us and we is rather of modern date. While monarchs supposed that they reigned in their own right, their style was I and me, (Dan. iii. 29. and vi. 26.) and it is only since they have been convinced that they reign by the consent of their people, and that the power and majesty of their people is centered in them, that the style hath been changed from the singular to the plural number.*

* Bishop Patrick observes, in his Commentary on Levit. v. 19. that Jonathan (I suppose in his Targum) paraphrases the last words of the verse—"against the Lord"—against the name of the Word of the Lord. And notes, that the doctrine of the ever-blessed Trinity was not unknown to the ancient Jews; as appears from the frequent mention of the Word of the Lord in the Chaldee paraphrasts, where the Hebrew hath only Jehovah: For which, saith the Bishop, I can see no reason at all, if there had not been a notion among them, of more persons than one, who were Jehovah. It doth not always, indeed, carry this signification in it; but there are very many places where by the WORD of the LORD cannot be meant a Word spoken by the Lord, or any thing else, but a person speaking or acting, who is the Lord. There is a famous instance of it in Gen. xxviii. 20, 21. where Jacob's vow is thus translated by Onkelos: Jacob vowed a vow, saying, If the WORD of the LORD will be with me, and keep me, &c. then shall the WORD of the LORD be my GOD. Where the WORD of the LORD is so plainly made the object of his adoration, that it evidently shows they had a notion in those days when Onkelos lived, (which was about our Saviour's time) of more persons than one who was the LORD. The Hierusalem Targum also speaks this so clearly, that one cannot but be something amazed to meet with such expressions in it as those upon Gen. iii. 22. The WORD of the LORD said, Behold, Adam, whom I have created, is my only-begotten in the world; as I am the only-begotten in the heavens above. Which may fairly induce a belief, that St. John understood the Indeed, so commonly had the opinion of God's having a Son obtained among the Jews, and that his Son was sometimes to appear in the world for great and good purposes, that it had got among the heathen; or they had received it by oral tradition from Adam, and possibly had grafted on it the ridiculous notion of the children of their Gods. Nebuchadnezzar, at the fiery furnace, and the Roman Centurion, at the crucifixion of Jesus, both use the phrase, the Son of God, as a common, or, at least, a known expression.

The Christian faith teacheth us, that with the humanity of Jesus, the divinity of the eternal Son of God was united, so as to make him both God and man in one person. In his humanity he executed the offices of the Prophet and Priest of God, which were, by the Father, committed to him. Many things said of the Son of God are accommodated to his humanity, the nature in which he acted in this world; and to his prophetic office, which, in that nature, he executed by commission from the Father. Many of the objections which have been made to the divinity of the Son of God, have arisen from applying the expressions of Scripture, which relate to the human nature of Jesus, and to his executing in human nature the prophetic and sacerdotal offices which God committed to him, to the divine eternal nature which the Son had before he took humanity upon him, and which known language of those times, when he declared our blessed Saviour's Godhead, under the name of the WORD, who was in the beginning with God, and was God.

resided and operated in Jesus, in consequence of the union of the human and divine nature in him: or, from not attending to the faith which the Christian Church, and the most strenuous assertors of the doctrine of the blessed Trinity, ever held; viz. that the Father was the origin and fountain of the divinity; and that, therefore, the Son was Deus de Deo, God of God. But hence to argue that the Father must be prior to the Son, or that the Son must be inferior in nature to the Father, is to draw consequences which the premises will not justify.

On this subject it is not possible always to speak with strict propriety; indeed not without some degree of absurdity—such is the scantiness of human capacity. Nor does nature afford any similitude by which we can exactly represent or explain it.

It is the nature of the sun to send forth light, and it ever was; nor can we suppose an instant since the sun existed, in which it did not do so. Though, therefore, light come from the sun, yet it is coeval with the sun, nor can imagination conceive it to have had a later beginning. We know that the sun exists. For it is this perpetual efflux of light from the sun, by which we know that it exists; which, indeed, makes it to be what it is. So it is the nature of the Father to generate the Son, not by an act of his will, nor by external necessity, but because he is God; because it is his nature so to do; and no instant ever existed in which this was not his nature. If, therefore, the Father be eternal, the Son is of the same eternity with him. And not only the eternity, but the whole nature of the Father must be in the Son, or he would not be his Son.

There is, therefore, no subordination of the Son to the Father, but that of order—none of nature—none but what arises from the relation of Father and Son: the Father being the origin from whom the Son is, and ever hath been, and ever will be generated, from eternity to eternity.

If we consider the generation of the Son as a transaction which is passed, and done, and ended, obscurity and difficulty will surround us. But the nature of God changeth not—he is ever the same. If it ever was the nature of the Father to beget the Son, it is so now, and ever will be so. The geniture of the Son is, therefore, a permanent continuance of the operation of the divine nature, which never began, and never will end. And from, or in consequence of this eternal, incessant generation of the Son, is the procession of the Holy Ghost, who, with the Father and the Son, is one God Almighty. In this unbeginning, never-ending generation and procession, consists the unity, the consubstantiality, the oneness of essence, the co-eternity and co-equality of the persons of the ever-blessed Trinity, and the felicity of God himself.

The Son must be of the same nature with the Father, because it is essential to the character of a son to be so. Distinct persons they may be, and they are, in the Scriptures, described as being so, and distinct operations are attributed to them: but one undivided essence, one God Almighty they must be; for God is indivisible, without body or parts.

On this ground, what Jesus said of his being in heaven, while he was here on earth; of his being one with the Father; of his being before Abraham was, is strictly intelligible; though the unity of the godhead, and the distinction of persons in it, be above the reach of our limited capacities. But why a person who believes the unity of God, should quarrel with the distinction of persons in the godhead, because he cannot comprehend it, I see not the reason. To conceive of the simple unity of God, is as hard to the human mind, as to conceive of a Trinity of persons in that unity; and the argument, from the want of comprehension, is just as strong in the one case, as in the other—They are both incomprehensible.

With regard to the eternity of the Son of God, there is one consideration arising from the representation which the Holy Scriptures give us of the nature of God, which appears to me to put that matter beyond all dispute or doubt. Of God they say, that he “only hath immortality,” dwelling in light unapproachable; and is invisible. (1 Tim. vi. 16.) That the Son is “the brightness,” the outward manifestation or display of “his glory”—that is, whatever of God is manifested to his creatures, is by and through the Son, by whom he created, by whom he redeemed, and by whom he governs the world. (Heb. i. 2, 3.) Had there, then, been a time when the Son did not exist, what manifestation of God, what display of his glory, could possibly have been made? And how could the Son have been created, or produced into being? The creation, or production of the Son, must have been a display of the glory of God: but when the Son was not, there was no medium by which to display his glory.

This view of the matter will lead us to the true understanding of those passages of Scripture which mention the visible appearance of God to Adam, Abraham, and others. God the Father is invisible; no man hath seen his shape at any time, nor heard his voice. (John v. 37.) It must, therefore, have been the appearance of the Son of God which the Scriptures mean. And the history of those appearances generally gives us a test by which to distinguish him from an Angel sent to execute the command of God—the requisition or acceptance of divine adoration.

In John xiv. 9. Jesus saith, “He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father.” How can this be true, unless the Son be the image, the visible manifestation of the Father? He, therefore, who seeth him, and heareth his doctrine, seeth the Father, and knoweth his will.

When God saw best, the Son of God took human nature upon him in the womb of the Virgin Mary, and was made, or became man, even the God-man, Jesus Christ. In human nature he was capable of making expiation for the sin of man, by offering himself a sin-offering, or sacrifice of atonement to God; that, by suffering in human nature, he might reconcile God to man who had sinned against him. And, by restoring the Holy Spirit who proceedeth from the Father and the Son, to man, enable him, through penitence, faith, and obedience, to be reconciled to God, that he might be happy with him in heaven, according to the original design of his creation. 2 Cor. v. 18, &c.

That this was the design of God in the redemption of the world is evident. But to give full efficacy to that design, and lead man, through penitence and holiness, to reconciliation with God, it became necessary that man should be fully instructed in the will of God, that he might conform himself to it, and live as God should direct. That he should also be instructed in the nature of the atonement made for sin, that he might believe it, and rely on it in the authority and dignity of the Person who made the atonement, and instructed him in the will of God, that he might confide in his merit, receive his instructions as the conditions of his acceptance through the atonement, and mark his example as the rule of his life; in the nature and office of the Holy Ghost, through whom he was to be enabled to do all that was to be required of him.

It, therefore, became necessary that Jesus, the Son of God, united to human nature, should be commissioned of God to be his Prophet to the world, to instruct them in the will of God, and in the things they were to do in order to be reconciled to God and that he should give the most indubitable proof that he was thus commissioned and sent of God. This Jesus did do, by a long series of astonishing miracles, performed publicly in the country of Judea.

It was also necessary that he should be appointed the Priest of God, to make atonement for sin, and reconcile God and men together, whom the sin of the latter had parted asunder. Of this appointment Jesus gave the fullest proof, and made a complete and perfect atonement and satisfaction for the sin of the world, by offering himself to God, and dying on the cross. Therefore is Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, by which man is admitted to new and mild terms of salvation, through faith in his blood—standing in the middle space to reconcile a holy God to offending man, by procuring for him remission of sins; and sinful man to the God of purity, by the sanctification of his spirit.

Of this Saviour Jesus, God and man united, commissioned of God to be his Priest and Prophet to the world, by the full effusion of the Holy Ghost upon him, without measure or limit, and confirmed by the miracles and mighty works which he wrought, are those expressions in the Scriptures to be understood which speak of God's giving, granting, showing unto the Son; of the Son's doing his works in imitation of the Father; of his having all power committed unto him, and being constituted head over all things in heaven and in earth.

To the Son of God all power and dominion belonged from eternity. Those things were ever his by nature, and could not be given or granted to him. Such expressions, therefore, relate to the God-man Jesus Christ, acting by commission from God, as his Priest and Prophet to the world, and, particularly, as the Governor and final Judge of it.

This is the second thing which the text presents to our consideration. I shall, therefore, endeavour to show, that this right of judgment is committed to Jesus Christ, as he is the Son of God made man—manifested in human flesh.

To this point the text bears decided testimony—“The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son.” To the Son this right belonged from eternity, seeing he is the creator and upholder of all things. But as Jesus, the Saviour, the Redeemer of the world, is not only the Son of God, but the Son of man also, this judgment is committed to him. John v. 27.

That Jesus is constituted Judge of the world, there are so many express declarations of the Holy Scriptures, that it is unnecessary to cite them.

The office of a Judge is to examine the state of those who are subject to his judgment, by certain rules or laws which are to regulate his judgment, and which have been the rule of life to those who are judged by him; and to pronounce sentence upon them, either of acquittal or condemnation, according as those laws shall direct.

Another part of the Judge's office is to see that the sentence he hath pronounced be carried into effect, either by rewarding those who are acquitted, or punishing those who are condemned, according as the law by which they have been judged shall direct.

This office, it is declared, Jesus shall, at the last day, exercise over all who ever lived: And,

First, over his Church; every member of which shall be judged, and acquitted or condemned by him, according as he shall have improved or neglected the talents committed to him—the precious doctrines of Christianity under which the merciful providence of God placed him.

Secondly, over all the nations of the earth, to whom the knowledge of salvation through Jesus was not made known. The rule of their judgment will be, the laws of that reasonable nature and conscience, and the revelations of his will, which God hath, at any time, given them for the direction of their conduct in life. Matt. xxv. 14, &c.

It is not, however, to be understood, that this right to judge the world which is committed to Jesus, is confined to the single process of the last day. The present government of the world is in his hands; and all the dispensations of Divine Providence, whether of mercy or judgment, are managed by him. “The Father judgeth no man,” saith Jesus in the text, “but hath committed all judgment unto the Son.” The same right he claimeth to himself by various other declarations, though made in different words. “All things are delivered unto me of my Father.” (Matt. xi. 27.) “All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth." (Matt. xxviii. 18.) "The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand." (John iii. 35.) And, in John xvii. 2, addressing himself to the Father, he said, "Thou hast given him (the Son) power over all flesh."

More citations, from various parts of the New Testament, might be added to these, to prove that both the present government and future judgment of the world are in the hand of Jesus. I shall, however, content myself with one from St. Paul: Speaking of the exaltation of his Divine Master, he saith, God "raised" Christ "from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come: and hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the Church." Eph. i. 20, 21, 22.

Thus is the God-man Jesus invested with that supremacy of power which belongs to the eternal Son of God. The consequence of this investiture is the last thing which the text presents to our view; namely,

Thirdly, the duty which arises from this right of judgment committed to the Son—"That all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father"—honour him, clothed with human flesh, even as the eternal and only begotten Son of God—one with the Father, and equal to him in nature—God blessed for ever.

The honour due to the Father being made the standard or test by which to estimate and regulate the honour due to the Son, we must consider in what that honour consists, and why it is paid to him by his faithful servants, that we may be ever ready to give the same honour to the Son.

As the Father is the Creator, Preserver, and Governor of the universe; reverence, adoration, and obedience are due to him from all the creatures of his hand. As he is infinite in power and goodness; prayer and supplication ought ever to be made to him, that we may obtain the good things necessary for us, and be protected from evil. As he is infinite in wisdom and truth; submission to his will and reliance on his promises are due to him. As he is the author and giver of all the abilities we possess, and of all the good we enjoy; thanksgiving and praise from grateful hearts ought ever to ascend to him.

That God made the worlds by his Son; that the Son upholdeth all things by the word of his power, is declared to us by the pen of an Apostle. That all judgment, and the present government of the world, is committed to him, we have seen from his own declarations. In whatever respects, therefore, worship, submission, faith, obedience, are due to the Father, they are also due to the Son, Jesus, God and man: because all men are required to honour the Son even as they honour the Father: and he who thus honoureth not the Son, honoureth not the Father, who sent him into the world invested with power and authority to be Governor and Judge of the whole earth.

If these things be so, can Jesus be mere man? Can he be any thing less than equal with God? Now, whatsoever is equal with God, is God.

The unity of God, and the duty of worshipping him only, was the doctrine of the Jewish church, established by divine revelation. "Hear, O Israel," said Moses, "the Lord our God is one Lord. Ye shall fear the Lord thy God, and shall serve him: Ye shall not go after other gods." Deut. vi. 4, 13, 14.

The obligation of this command was not only acknowledged by the Jews, but by Jesus himself, when he said to the tempter, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." (Matt. iv. 10.) In several places of the Scripture, God claims his right to adoration and worship, and declares he will not give that right—his glory—to another. (Isa. xlii. 3.) But in the text equal honour is ordered to be paid to the Son with that which is paid to the Father. The Son, therefore, is not a creature; for divine honour, such as is due to the Father, being paid to any creature, however highly exalted he may be, is idolatry, and to be abhorred by all christian people. The Son, therefore, must be God; and, if God, eternal: for every being who had a beginning must be a creature; and no creature can be the object of divine adoration.

Hence arises the argument, that the Son is not begotten by an act of the Father's will; for then he would have a beginning, and consequently be a creature. Nor could he be begotten through any external necessity; for no such necessity can approach God, who is almighty. The Son must, therefore, be eternally begotten, according to the nature of God—even as the sun in the heavens naturally emits light, and hath done so from the first moment of its existence, and while it exists will ever continue to do so: and was it possible to conceive it to cease to do so, it would, from that moment, cease to be the sun.

The human nature of Jesus, therefore, considered alone, by itself, distinct from and unconnected with his divine nature, is not the object of adoration; but it becomes so in consequence of its being, in an ineffable manner, taken into God, and made one with the Son of God by unity of person—God and man, divinely united, making one Christ; for “as the reasonable soul and flesh is one man, so God and man is one Christ.”

Whoever, therefore, believing Jesus to be only man, or only a creature, worships him as God, is guilty of idolatry: for, whatever is not God cannot be the object of Christian worship; and no creature can be God.

If it be said by Arians and Socinians, that they do not worship the Son as the supreme God, but with subordinate worship, as to a being inferior to him: I reply; The Scripture no where directs any subordinate worship to be paid to any being: its language is, “Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve.” Besides, to give subordinate worship to the Son, is not to honour him as they honour the Father, to whom, as I suppose, they profess to pay supreme adoration.

To believe the Son to be God, and yet to be inferior, as God, to the Father, is nonsense. It implies the ridiculous notion of two gods, one superior, the other inferior: and is no better than the old heathenish notion of a plurality of gods, in gradation down from Fate supreme, to paltry Priapus.

It is here natural to remark, that this God who is worshipped with subordinate worship, is either created, or uncreated. If created, whoever worships him with divine worship, is guilty of idolatry in giving that worship to a creature, which is due to the Creator only. If he be uncreated, he must be God supreme—"equal to the Father as touching his Godhead." And as there can be but one God, he must be of the same essence with the Father, and equal partner in the adorable nature of Jehovah; and equal honour is due to him with the Father. There can be no gradation in the Godhead. Whoever is not the supreme God, is no God, and, therefore, no object of divine worship.

The Son, then, being God of the same nature with the Father, eternally generated by him, and being the Creator, Preserver, and Governor of the world, hath the right of judgment over all creatures inherent in himself. And being united to human nature, by taking the manhood into God; dying in that nature a sacrifice for the sin of the world; and rising again in that nature from death on the third day, and ascending into heaven, had the right of judgment, which belonged to him the eternal Son of God, committed by the Father to him, as he was Jesus Christ, the Son of God in human nature, God and man united. The reason assigned why this is done, is, "That all men should honour the Son" of God united to humanity, "even as they honour the Father"—That all men might see and know the high honour and dignity to which the humanity of Jesus, united to the divine nature of the Son of God, is exalted, because it was "obedient to death, even the death of the cross," (Philipp. ii. 8.) for the redemption of the world; and might be thereby led to honour, worship, and obey him, with the same supreme honour, worship, and obedience, which they pay to the Father. For, consider; was it possible to conceive this right of judging the world to have been committed to some other being than the Son of God, who is the Creator, the Upholder, and Redeemer of the world; would it have been no diminution of his dignity? no lessening of his honour and glory? The probable consequence is, that the regard and obedience of men would have been divided between him who is their creator and redeemer, and him who was to be their judge. Whereas, the blessings of creation and redemption flowing from the same person to whom the right of judgment is committed, the reverence and honour, the worship and obedience, the love and gratitude which are due to him, will the more readily be called forth, the more cordially and cheerfully paid.*

* A similar sentiment I have read in one of Bishop Sherlock's sermons; but I know not where to find it. Though, I believe, the worthy Bishop applies it to show the propriety of the Son of God, who is the creator of men, being also their redeemer.

The duty enjoined on us in the Text is, that we should honour the Son even as we honour the Father: and this duty being enforced by the strong tie of creation, and by the more affectionate tie of redemption, as well as by the authority of Jesus to whom all judgment is committed, let us see that we be ever ready to pay it to him, with humble and devout hearts.

The open denial of the divinity of Jesus Christ which now prevails in the world; the debasement of his character to a level with that of Luther, Mahomet,* &c. the propensity to consider all religions as equal in themselves; and the disposition to return to the heathenish worship from which our ancestors were converted to Christianity,† which has shown itself in various parts of the world,—make it necessary that all Christ's faithful servants, especially the ministers of his word, should openly

† The prevalence of theatrical entertainments, which, notwithstanding the fine things that have been said of them, strongly tend to the corruption of principles and manners, to fill the mind with the lust of sensual pleasure, and to wear all religious impressions from it; the erecting of heathen temples and pagodas, as ornaments in their pleasure-grounds, and setting up the statues of the heathen gods and goddesses in conspicuous points of view; the naming men of war in honour of these fictitious deities; dignifying a superb place of entertainment with the name of the Pantheon—the temple of all the gods; the total rejection of the religion of Jesus, and of the name of God in another country; the disregard of the sign of the cross, the emblem of Christianity—I had almost said, the contempt with which it is ignorantly treated in our own country—all these things, taken together, show that the transition from Christianity to heathenism would be an event not very difficult to be accomplished. And who can say that, for these things, among others, God is not now calling the nations of the world to judgment, and making them the dreadful scourges of each other?

and steadfastly maintain the divine nature of him who hath bought them with his blood, reconciled God to them, established for them the sure hope of eternal life through himself, and taught them how to obtain it.

To this duty let me call you earnestly, my Reverend Brethren; and, I trust in God, you will not fail in it. The distinguished mercy of our august and beloved Master, who hath, by his grace, called us to the honour of serving in his holy church, of making known the glad tidings of salvation through him, and of ministering in holy things to his people, binds strongly on us the obligations of this duty. The force of these obligations is increased by what we owe to his people and to the world. On us, in a good degree, it depends, whether the pure word of God be fully and fairly preached, the sacraments of his church duly administered, and the obligations of holiness explained and enforced.

None of these things can be effectually done, unless the divine nature of Jesus Christ be asserted and inculcated as the ground and sure foundation of all we say or do in his church. All is vain and useless, unless supported by his divinity and merit. "No salvation is there in any other; for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." Acts iv. 12.

Though I am confident, Reverend Brethren, that you are duly sensible of your duty in this respect, and that you will always be ready, with a cheerful mind, to act agreeably to it, let it not be thought superfluous if I again bring to your notice the latter part of the text: "He that honoureth not the Son, honoureth not the Father which sent him." He who honoureth not the Son to whom all judgment is committed, honoureth not the Father who hath committed all judgment unto him, and sent him into the world.

There is, therefore, no way of honouring the Father, but in and by and through the Son, by whom alone he is or can be manifested; "who is the brightness of his glory, the express image of his person," the image of the invisible God," who is himself "God blessed forever"—in whom, and by whom, and through whom alone, we can see, and know, and have access to the Father.

To the grace and protection of the holy, undivided TRINITY, ONE GOD ALMIGHTY, I commend you, Reverend and Beloved Brethren; beseeching him to direct your hearts and bless your ministry; that, holding fast the faith once delivered to the saints, and turning many to righteousness through that wisdom which is from above, you may rise from the dust of the earth to everlasting life, and shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars, for ever and ever, in the heavenly kingdom of your God.

To the ONE GOD JEHOVAH, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, Trinity of persons in one divine essence, be honour, glory, and dominion, now and for ever. AMEN.

From what hath been said it appears, that the authority by which the Son of God governeth and judgeth the world, is inherent in him as he is the Son of God, eternally begotten of the Father, and, therefore, of the same nature, essence, and power with him, being the Creator and Preserver of the world. And the authority by which Jesus governeth and judgeth the world, is committed to him, because the godhead and human nature are conjoined in him, “not by confusion of substance, but by unity of person;” “the manhood being taken into God.”

From the dignity of the person of the Son of God, we may see the necessity, as well as the propriety, of his having all judgment inherent in him. His infinite power and knowledge and wisdom and truth eminently entitle him to it, qualify him for it, and enable him to discharge it.

His taking the manhood into God, shows the propriety with which all judgment is committed to the God-man, Christ Jesus. Being man as well as God, we are governed and judged by one in our own nature; one who knoweth whereof we are made—our weakneses, temptations, difficulties, and distresses, having himself felt them, and will, therefore, graciously make all proper allowance for them.

Having, I trust, shown the divinity of the Son of God united to human nature in Jesus Christ, and the propriety of his having all judgment committed to him, that he might be the object of our full faith and best obedience, I beg leave to mention another consideration arising from the text, and highly worthy of our regard.

Not many years back, a scheme of religion was preached in this country, and hath since considerably spread, asserting the final salvation of all men through Jesus Christ. Had this final salvation been predicted on the repentance of all men, I know not that it would have been necessary to have said any thing against it. But, on the contrary, all faith, repentance, obedience, and every requisite and mean of salvation, as they have been commonly understood and taught in the Church of Christ, are excluded: all terms and conditions of salvation are denied. Christ, they say, gave no laws, and requires nothing to be done. Nor do the assertors of this doctrine appear to make holiness, or a good life, of any consequence beyond this world. The troubles, distresses, and sorrows of this life, and the doubts and uncertainties which will perplex the wicked in the intermediate state between death and the resurrection, they consider as the only suffering for sin. But, at the resurrection, every one will come forth to happiness and glory in the heavenly kingdom of God.

Whether these be the doctrines of every one of those who call themselves Universalists, or whether every one hath a distinct creed, I know not. But these are points I have collected from conversation with a sensible man, of good character, who seems to be a leader among them.

Antinomianism appears to be the ground of this scheme; new-modelled, indeed, by extending the benefits of Christ's death to the whole world, which the old Antinomians confined only to the elect.

But, that they stand on the same ground appears from their representing the sins of men merely as a debt due to almighty God. This debt, they say, Christ hath fully paid as their substitute: that, therefore, it would be inconsistent with the justice of God to demand again the payment of his debt, which had already been paid by his substitute. Besides;

They both ascribe salvation—the Antinomian, of the elect; the Universalist, of all men—to the absolute, unconditional decree of God, without any regard to the goodness or holiness of men.

My subject does not require me to enter into this controversy. Yet, after observing that religious errors have commonly some truth mixed with them, I shall remark, that the above position does not seem to accord well with the Text.

That Christ made a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world, will not be disputed by any member of Christ's Church who understands his religion. But it appears from the Text, that the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son. The office of a Judge is to examine the actions of men, to pass sentence on them according to their actions, compared with the rule of life which God gave them.

Christ hath declared, that he will execute this judgment; and that "the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth, they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation." According to this declaration of the holy Jesus, his final judgment shall follow the general resurrection at the last day; and shall discriminate between those who have done good, and those who have done evil: and the sentence which he shall pronounce, he will fulfil on them—blessedness to the good, condemnation to the evil.

To appeal to the justice of God in this matter, and say that he will not require a second payment of the debt of sin, which Christ, our substitute, hath already satisfied, is talking ignorantly. The justice of God is not concerned in the matter. The Son of God is the Creator of men; he is also their Redeemer; having bought them with his blood, they are his: he is now their Governor and their Judge, and will finally pass an irrevocable sentence on them, according as the laws of his Gospel, and of that reasonable nature he hath given them, shall direct. His sentence will be just, and will be executed. Nor is there any diversity of will in the Father and Son: they are not two, but one God. And, "the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son." Besides;

The Father hath given to the Son, "power over all flesh." (John xvii. 2.) This power necessarily implies the power of judgment—of punishing and rewarding, as his justice shall direct. Suppose, for a moment, that, at the last day, Christ hath no power to condemn the wicked, but only power to give them eternal life, and then tell me how he hath power over all flesh? Tell me, too, what becomes of his office of administering all judgment, which the Father hath committed to him?

I am not ignorant that the Universalists have proposed a new translation of the latter part of John xvii. 2. ἵνα πᾶν ὃ δίδωκας αὐτῷ, δώσῃ αὐτοῖς ζωὴν αἰώνιον, which they render, that every thing which thou hast given to him, he may give to them, even eternal life. But this translation cannot be just, because it advances a position which is not true, viz. that Christ will give to all men every thing which God hath given to him, even eternal life. This makes eternal life equivalent to every thing which the Father hath given to the Son, which is not true. The Father hath made the Son head of the Church; hath committed all judgment unto him; hath given him power over all flesh—all power in heaven and earth; hath put all things under his feet. This super-eminency of power and dignity is no part of that eternal life reserved for the faithful servants of God. It is not, therefore, true that Christ is to give them every thing which the Father hath given to him.

With regard to the translation in our Bible, “that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him,” I have consulted Hammond and Whitby, both good Greek critics, and both disposed to amend errors in our translation: and they neither of them take notice of any thing amiss in the rendering of this verse.

Pool, in his Synop. Critic. gives the very translation of the Universalists; ut omne quod dedisti ei, det eis, et tandem vitam eternam. He observes that $\pi\alpha\nu\ \acute{\omicron}$ is a Hebraism for $\pi\acute{\alpha}\sigma\iota\ \acute{\omicron}$, or $\pi\alpha\sigma\iota\nu$, and makes the true rendering of it to be, ut omnibus quos dedisti ei, det eis vitam eternam—that to all whom thou hast given to him, he may give eternal life. Those who are given to Christ, he makes to be those whom God hath subjected to him as their Redeemer and Mediator. These, according to Dr. Hammond, are they who are called to the profession of Christ's religion, and obey him. John vi. 39.

Pool adduces the passage from John vi. 39. $\acute{\omicron}\iota\ \pi\acute{\alpha}\nu\ \acute{\omicron}\ \delta\acute{\iota}\delta\omicron\kappa\epsilon\ \mu\omicron\iota\ \acute{\omicron}\ \pi\alpha\tau\acute{\eta}\rho,\ \mu\epsilon\ \acute{\alpha}\pi\omicron\lambda\epsilon\iota\omega\ \epsilon\acute{\xi}\ \acute{\alpha}\upsilon\tau\acute{\omicron}$; where Jesus cannot speak of things, but of persons, as appears by the context, particularly by his subjoining, $\acute{\alpha}\lambda\lambda\acute{\alpha}\ \acute{\alpha}\nu\alpha\sigma\tau\acute{\eta}\sigma\omega\ \acute{\alpha}\upsilon\tau\acute{\omicron}\ \epsilon\iota\ \tau\eta\ \acute{\epsilon}\chi\acute{\alpha}\tau\eta\ \eta\mu\acute{\epsilon}\rho\alpha$; where, though the whole verse be expressed in the neuter gender and singular number, it is evident the meaning is plural, and relates to persons, not to things. "And," or "but, this is the will of the Father who sendeth me, that of all those he hath given to me, I should lose none, but should raise them up at the last day."

The new version which the Universalists have given of John xvii. 2. is therefore inadmissible. It advances a position not true in itself; and it is unsupported by good criticism, founded on accurate knowledge of the Greek language, and of the Hebraisms used by St. John.

In the close of the process of the general judgment at the last day, which Jesus himself hath given us in Matt. xxv. it evidently appears, that all mankind shall be judged by him, receive their sentence from him, and have that sentence fulfilled by his authority—"These," said he, the wicked represented by the goats on his left hand, "shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal."

The Universalists evade the argument arising from this description of the general judgment, by saying that the goats do not denote men, but devils; that is, wicked angels. By the same construction, the righteous ought not to mean men, but good angels; for they both relate to the same order of beings, and are distinguished, not by their nature, but by their properties or qualifications. For their works of benevolence and mercy, the sheep, the righteous are acquitted by their Judge, and rewarded with life eternal. And because they had neglected the works of benevolence and mercy, the goats, the wicked are consigned to everlasting punishment.

That the devils shall be judged and condemned at the general judgment, appears from the Scriptures. But it appears not that they are represented by goats; nor is the process of their judgment made known to us. Besides; to say to wicked men, who have taken part with devils in their iniquity, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels," is a natural mode of speech. Hell is, or rather will be prepared for the devils; it was not originally intended for men, and will finally be the portion only of those among them who take part with the devil, do his work, and form themselves into his temper. But to say to devils, ‘Depart into everlasting fire prepared for the devils and his angels,’ is a form of expression that will not be used by a good grammarian, as it must sound harsh and uncouth to every ear.

The goats were sentenced to everlasting punishment, because they had not fed the hungry, nor clothed the naked, nor visited the sick, nor administered to the various necessities of human nature. These duties are not, that I know of, required of devils, but of men: men, therefore, not devils, will be condemned for their deficiency in them.

What I have delivered is plainly the doctrine of Christianity. In support of it, I have cited nothing but the words of Jesus Christ, the Son of God: and to his authority, I assure myself, you will always pay a ready obedience. In conformity to their divine Master, his holy Apostles have ever delivered the same doctrine on this subject; viz. That Christ shall judge the world at the last day: that the open actions, and secret thoughts and designs of men, shall come before him: that his sentence shall be final, and shall be fully carried into effect: that he will render glory and immortality to those who have done good, and inflict indignation and wrath upon those who have done evil; according to the laws of his Gospel.

It is true, that as the Father is the fountain of the divinity from which the Son is eternally generated; and as the Son hath the same nature and will with the Father, and doth nothing but what he seeth the Father do, that is, in exact conformity with him; so every thing the Son doth, and all the honour he receiveth, ultimately centers in the Father, according to the subordination (of order only, not of nature) in the holy Trinity. In the œconomy, however, of the creation, redemption, and salvation of men, every Person in the Trinity is represented as having his distinct office: The Father is the Creator, the Son the Redeemer, and the Holy Ghost the Sanctifier of men; yet all the blessed Persons of the triune God acting, in all things, in unity of nature and will.

The full and perfect sacrifice and satisfaction which Christ made for the sins of the world has been mentioned. But to whom the benefits of that satisfaction belong, whether to those who live and die in their wickedness, or to those only who repent and forsake their sins, and live and die in obedience to God, is a distinct consideration; but a consideration which nearly affects every one. God is reconciled to man by the death of his Son. But is it not necessary that man be reconciled to God by holiness of life? If not, how is the reconciliation between God and man complete? or how is Christ an effectual Mediator? In 2 Cor. v. 18, &c. this two-fold reconciliation, of God to man by the death of his Son, and of man to God by holiness or "righteousness," is clearly set forth, and ought to be attentively regarded by those who look to him for salvation without repentance and a good life; that is, such a life as the Gospel requires.

The sanctification of the heart by the Spirit of God is necessary to salvation through Christ, because “without holiness no man shall see”—be happy with—“the Lord;” and because when we have our “fruit unto holiness,” “the end” will be “eternal life.” Rom. vi. 22.

To suppose that the man who dies unholy shall, by the power of God, be made holy in the next world, hath no promise of God to stand on. It is, therefore, not faith, but opinion. Faith is built on the promises and declarations of God; opinions stand on the conclusions of a man’s own mind: and however they may be excusable in the Philosopher; in the Christian, especially in the Christian Minister, who “walks by faith, not by sight,” or opinion, they can never be justified. His business is to preach repentance and faith to the sinner in this world—conversion of the heart from sin to holiness, that his sins may be forgiven, and his soul saved in the day of the Lord. Further his commission reaches not: Nor can he give any assurance of the remission of sins on any other ground, except his own opinion. And the man who takes up with opinion instead of faith; that is, builds his hope of salvation on his own notions, instead of the promises and declarations of God, is in no good way to eternal life.

HEAVEN THE CITY OF CHRISTIANS.

PHILIPP. iii. 20, 21. For our conversation is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ; who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.

IN some of the verses which precede the text, the Apostle had directed the Philippians to be followers of him as their pattern in Christian conversation, and to mark them as examples of holy living, who copied after him in the conduct of their lives. He hath thereby not only intimated, but established it to be the duty of all Christian ministers, to adorn their station in Christ's Church with a holy and unblamable life; exhibiting all the graces and virtues of that heavenly conversation which their religion requires. Hence the duty of those who live under their ministry, to follow and imitate their example, will be evident.

The propriety of this conduct, both in Christian ministers and people, appears from what the Apostle hath said in the two verses immediately before the Text—"Many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now again tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ: whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly; and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things."

This declaration of the Apostle ought to convince us, that those professors of Christianity who, instead of exhibiting the open practice of the graces and virtues of their holy religion in their lives, indulge themselves in vice and immorality, are enemies to the religion they profess. As much as in them lieth, they destroy the efficacy of the redemption of Christ: With regard to themselves, they entirely defeat it. The design of Christ's redemption is eternal salvation; but their end will be destruction.

That we might be at no loss with respect to that conduct which makes a man the enemy of the cross of Christ, and endeth in destruction, the Apostle hath told us, it is the conduct of those "whose God is their belly"—of those, namely, who indulge themselves in the excesses of sensual living; who exert themselves to enjoy the pleasures of the palate; who place their happiness in eating and drinking, not to satisfy their natural hunger, but to gratify the cravings of appetite, made capricious and humorfome by indulgence.

If we reflect that our religion requires abftinence from fenfual pleafure, the denial and mortification of the appetites of the body to that degree, that the flefh being fubdued to the Spirit, we may obey all godly motions “in righteoufnefs and true holinefs;” we fhall not be furprized at the heavy cenfure the Apoftle hath caft on thofe who make the indulgence of the ftomach the principal end of their living. “His fervants ye are to whom ye obey.” He who obeys the cravings of his ftomach, and is perpetually contriving ways and means to gratify its defires, is properly its fervant—all his care is, how to ferve it; and his greateft happinefs arifes from its gratification. In truth, it is his God, for it has his affections and fervices, and is the fource of his higheft enjoyment.

Another reafon which fhows the baneful effects of habitually gratifying the cravings of the ftomach is, that over-feeding, efpecially with rich and delicate food, increafes and inflames all the other appetites of the body, and, in proportion, the paffions of the mind. They become more unruly, more difficult to be controlled, and lead directly to the perpetration of thofe crimes which the Apoftle cenfures, when he fays of thofe who live in them, “whofe glory is in their fhame”—Shame, indeed, to follow the bent of inordinate affections into the practice of wantonnefs and lewdnefs: Still greater fhame, to boaft and glory in them, as if they were the higheft honour and perfection of human nature.

No better conduct, however, is to be expected of those enemies of the cross of Christ, whose evil character the Apostle hath summed up, when he said that they “mind earthly things”—mind them so as to mind little else. The enjoyments and delights of the present scene of their being, engage entirely their attention; in them they place their happiness; on them they employ their pains; regardless of all the hopes and promises of another life; as if, like the brute animals, their nature were capable of no enjoyment but what springs from this world, and is to be obtained in this life.

With far different sentiments does our holy religion inspire all its true votaries. View the pattern which the holy Apostle set to the Philippians and to all Christians; to the imitation of which he ardently pressed them, when he said, “Brethren, be followers together of me; and mark them which walk so, as ye have us for an ensample.” The example he set in this matter is described in his Epistle to the Corinthians. (1 Cor. ix. 27.) Instead of feeding his body beyond what the necessity of nature required, he kept it under, and brought it into subjection, lest if he neglected to practice that abstinence and mortification which he preached to others, he should become a castaway—a reprobate rejected of God.

In the text he also proposeth his own example as a pattern to others, and describeth it as springing from very different principles, when compared to those which govern the conduct of men of the world. “Our conversation,” saith he, “is in heaven." We pamper not the body, that we may enjoy its lusts: we make not our belly our God; nor glory in our shame; nor mind earthly things. So far from it, we are scarcely men of this world, and live not according to the fashion of worldly maxims.

The Greek word πολιτευμα, translated conversation, signifies the government of a city or country, the administration of that government, a number of people living under the same laws, the rights and privileges of a citizen.

The meaning of the expression, "Our conversation is in heaven," is, therefore, that the government of the community to which Christians belong, and the administration of that government, are in heaven, not on earth—that they are members of a society which, though part of it be in the world, is not of the world, but is taken out of it, and, by adoption, made free of the new Jerusalem, the city of the great King, Jesus the Saviour, the head of the Church which is his kingdom.

Of this kingdom Jesus spake when, before "Pontius Pilate, he witnessed a good profession," and said, "My kingdom is not of this world." Its polity, therefore, and the administration of it, are from heaven, the residence of its King. For when he had finished his ministry here on earth, having made expiation for the sin of the world by his death; having laid the foundation of his Church in this world, and committed the administration of it to his Apostles, under the direction of the Holy Ghost; having triumphed over the devil, sin, and death, by his resurrection from the grave; he ascended up on high to take possession of his kingdom which he had purchased, or earned by his humiliation and sufferings, and is now "seated at the right hand of the throne of God." Heb. xii. 2.

From this state of exaltation he gave gifts unto men, (Ps. lxxviii. 18. Eph. iv. 8.) particularly the gift of the Holy Ghost, the blessed Spirit of God, whom, according to his own most true promise, he sent from the Father upon his Apostles and Church, to be with them to the end of the world, "that the Lord God might dwell among them." Under the direction of this Spirit is the government, the ministry, the faith, doctrines, discipline, and whatever relates to the Church, placed. All the offices in the Church are his various ministrations for the edification, the building up, the improvement, the perfecting of the Church in faith and holiness. And through the Church, every member of it receives the heavenly influences, and holy inspirations of this divine and life-giving Spirit.

Men, therefore, are not born members of this Church by their natural birth; but according to the appointment of him who is its King and Governor, its Redeemer and Saviour, they who by faith embrace his mediation, are taken out of this world, because of its enmity against God, translated into his Church, and made denizens of it by the regeneration of baptism and the renewing of the Holy Ghost.

All our sentiments and expressions of spiritual and eternal things, being taken from things natural and temporal, it is highly probable that St. Paul was led into this manner of representing the condition of Christians, by the practice of the Roman government under which he lived. With them it was common, in reward of services performed, or as an encouragement to the performance of them, or from meer good-will, to admit, not only particular persons to the freedom and franchises of Rome, but whole cities in many parts of their empire. All who were afterward born free of such cities, were born free also of the city of Rome.

This was the case of St. Paul. He was born at Tarsus, a city of Cilicia, a free colony; that is, its inhabitants enjoyed the immunities and rights of citizens at Rome; and this freedom he pleaded on more than one occasion, to screen himself from such punishment as could not be inflicted legally on Roman freemen.

Philippi, to the Christian inhabitants of which St. Paul wrote this Epistle, had been admitted to the same privileges. They would readily understand the meaning of his expression, "Our citizenship is in heaven," to be, that as they were citizens of heaven, they ought to attend to the interest, and honour, and manners of that city to which they belonged; not to mind earthly things, because they related merely to this world, out of which they had been taken by the mercy of God, and translated into the kingdom of his dear Son; made freemen of Jerusalem, which is above, the city of the living God. And that as they had been endowed with this exalted privilege, they, at the same time, became subject to the government, obliged to obey the laws, fulfil the duties, comply with the manners and customs of that society, and in this world have their conversation in heaven. For this was the case with all those foreigners who were admitted to the freedom of Rome. They became possessed of advantages very considerable, and of high estimation in the world. But they became subject to the laws of Rome, and it was expected they would fulfil all the duties those laws required.

The application of this case to Christians in general is very obvious. By the goodness of God they are taken out of this wicked world, and made free citizens of the new Jerusalem, the city of the living God, which hath foundations stable and eternal, and subject to none of the vicissitudes of mortal things. In virtue of their adoption into this city, they claim many rights and privileges of high value, but which they could claim on no other account: Such are the forgiveness of sins and a blessed immortality after the resurrection.

When they became freemen of this city, and entitled to its privileges and blessings, they became also subject to its laws and government, and obliged to live according to its customs and manners. They must renounce its enemies; they must maintain its honour; they must consult its peace; they must seek its prosperity. At present they live in a foreign country, remote from their city, and from the full enjoyment of the great blessings which they hope assuredly they shall one day receive in it. Their eyes and heart, and every faculty of their soul ought to be fixed where their complete happiness is expected. The friendship of the world, they know, is enmity with God, the Sovereign of that holy city of which they are members. They must not, therefore, hold alliance with it; nor live by its maxims; nor adopt its principles; nor covet its riches; nor seek its pleasures; but renouncing its pomps and vanities, its delusive hopes and vain enjoyments, and keeping steadfast to the laws and manners of that city whose builder and maker is God, wait, in faith and patience, for the completion of all their hopes.

The laws of that city are in full force upon them in their pilgrimage in this world, and by them they are required to regulate their conduct. It is their misfortune that, incumbered as they are in this mortal life, with the body of sin and death, and exposed to the assaults of the prince of darkness, they cannot always live free from sin, and in the same purity with the souls of their fellow-citizens, who have been called already by their King and God, to the participation of peace and refreshment in the heavenly paradise. To aspire after as great a degree of their purity as human frailty will permit, is however their duty. By this resemblance they will become companions meet for them, when it shall please God to call them also out of the miseries of this sinful world, to join their heavenly society.

This happiness we, as Christians, hope to enjoy.

We should, therefore, endeavour to fit ourselves for it by doing faithfully all those things which God requires of us. The prospect of the bliss we hope to enjoy in the kingdom of God, ought to fill our hearts with love and gratitude to him, and raise them above all anxious desires after the fleeting happiness of this vain world.

This conduct, on our part, would ward off, or greatly lighten the troubles of life. It would moderate the violence of passion and appetite, which, through their impetuosity, give us so much uneasiness, and involve us in so many sins. It would reconcile us to the thoughts of our own dissolution, which must ere long take place; but whether it will open to us scenes of happiness or misery, depends on our present conduct. If we preserve our right to our heavenly inheritance, by preserving that holy conversation which God requires, happy shall we be in death. It will open to us the gate of paradise, and lead us to a blessed immortality, when the morning of the resurrection shall wake us from the sleep of the grave.

But if we forget or neglect the holy city of our God, and, turning from the glories it holds out to us, become like those of whom the Apostle speaks, when he says, "Whose God is their belly, whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things;" we shall forfeit our inheritance, and, like them, "shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power; when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe, in that day." (2 Thef. i. 9, 10.) For, from heaven "we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ."

In great humility he once came into the world to redeem us from the deadly curse of sin, to open to us the gate of everlasting life, and make us citizens of Jerufalem which is above, which is free, and the mother of us all. At the end of the world, we believe he will come again in his glorious majesty to judge the quick and the dead, and to recompense every one with happiness or misery eternal, according as his life hath been.

At that time, may we be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless, and received to the full enjoyment of the happiness of that city, whose builder and maker is God. So be it, blessed God, for Jesus sake, our only Lord and Saviour. Amen.

DISCOURSE VI.

PART THE SECOND.

JESUS THE RESURRECTION AND THE LIFE.

IN the former part of this Discourse, I have explained the first part of the Text, in which St. Paul recommendeth his own example to the Philippians, for their imitation in the christian life. My present business is with the second part of it, which hath been just introduced to your notice by observing, that the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, once came in great humility to redeem us from the curse of sin, and to open to us the gate of everlasting life, by making us free citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem.

The proper inference to be drawn from this observation is, that our conversation ought to correspond with these exalted privileges: because we believe this same Lord Jesus Christ will come again at the end of the world; not in humility as a Redeemer, but in glory and majesty, as the Judge of the living and dead; and that he will then recompense every man according to his deeds.

This is the Christian's faith. Into it he was baptized, when he was admitted as a citizen of heaven. Judge for yourselves, what his life and conversation ought to be: whether he ought not to remember his heavenly inheritance, and live as the laws of that holy place require; or whether it would be decent for him to neglect it, and become the enemy of the cross of Christ, by which he is redeemed from death, and hath those rich blessings made over to him.

Judge also what the magnificent scene of that tremendous majesty must be, when the Son of God shall descend in the glory of the Father, with all his holy Angels, to reckon with the inhabitants of the earth: with you, and me, and with every one who hath ever lived. Are you prepared to enter the trial? If not, beg of God the grace of repentance, that, through the blood of Jesus, your sins may be passed over, by the mercy of God.

To the good and to the evil the issue of this judgment will be very different. "The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the people who forget God:" while the righteous shall shine as the sun, in the kingdom of their Father for ever.

"From heaven," saith the Apostle, "we," Christians, "look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ; who shall change our vile body that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body."

Behold the high reward proposed to the faithful Christian; and let it excite his wishes, and stimulate his endeavours to obtain it. Vile and worthless is the human body, since through the defilement of sin it was loaded with infirmity: through its own frailness it drops into the grave and dissolves in corruption.

However vile and worthless by nature the body of the good Christian may be, it is coheir with the soul of all the privileges of that heavenly city, whose builder and maker is God. It is part of that humanity which the Son of God took on himself, when he came to bear the sin of the world; and, through faith in his blood, it is an heir of all the blessings he purchased by his death—a coheir with him of the kingdom of heaven. Hear what he himself hath said: “The hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice”—the voice of the Son of God—“and shall come forth, they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation.” John v. 28, 29.

“They that have done good” shall come forth “unto the resurrection of life.” In conformity to this declaration of his divine Master, St. Paul, speaking of those who shall be found alive at the coming of Christ to judgment, hath said, “We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed.” 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52.

There shall, therefore, be a resurrection of the dead, both of the good and of the evil. And when this event shall take place, they who shall be alive shall be changed from corruption to incorruption, from mortality to an endless existence. After this scene, the general judgment shall follow. The good shall be separated from the evil. They who through faith, and penitence, and good works, have preserved their right to the heavenly inheritance—have ordered their conversation according to the laws and manners of that city which is above, of which they were admitted to be free members by holy baptism, shall be accepted by their Judge, and advanced to the full enjoyment of those rights and blessings which they can now embrace only by faith and hope. Through the merit of their Redeemer, they shall triumphantly enter in his train into the holy city, the Church of the first-born in heaven, and live with him in glory and happiness for ever.

They, on the contrary, who have done evil—have renounced their faith, have lost their patience, have lived impenitently, have neglected the good works of their holy religion, and have thereby forfeited their right to the heavenly inheritance, have taken part with the enemies of the cross of Christ, have lived in the lust and evil affections of their present nature, have minded only earthly things, and have thereby forfeited their right to the heavenly inheritance, shall then find their end to be destruction: they shall be driven from the presence of the Lord, to live with apostate spirits, whose part they have chosen, and whom they have served.

What change will be made in the bodies of the wicked after the resurrection, further than that they will be rendered immortal, doth not appear. But the bodies of those Christians who have walked worthy of their vocation, shall be changed, and fashioned like unto the glorious body of Christ; because they are members of his body, and animated by his Spirit; fellow-heirs with him of the heavenly inheritance, and partakers of the glory which shall be revealed in that day.

“Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.” In its present state of humiliation and dishonour, of frailty and necessity, of sin and impurity, of affliction and sorrow, of pain and sickness, of decay and death, the human body is incapable of celestial happiness. The Spirit of God, with which the Christian is endued, can animate it by faith, and purify it by holiness. Then, in the day of the resurrection, when the almighty power of the Son of God shall bring the dead from their graves, its vileness shall give place to immortality and glory, in all those “who love his appearing.” Though born into this world “in corruption, it shall be raised in incorruption:” though born “in dishonour, it shall be raised in glory:” though born “in weakness, it shall be raised in power:” though born “an animal body, it shall be raised a spiritual body,” and be exactly fitted to enjoy the full happiness prepared for it in the city of God.

The greatness of this change will not exceed the belief of the pious Christian. He knows the power of the person who is to effect it. "From heaven he looks for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body—according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things to himself." "As the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them; even so the Son quickeneth whom he will. For as the Father hath life in himself; so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself." (John v. 21, 26.) And "the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth." Verse 28, 29.

He who hath life in himself, and power to give life to the dead, must be the author and fountain of life—God himself. He, therefore, cannot want power to change our body from its present vile state, and make it what his wisdom sees best—"like unto his own most glorious body." Through the energy of his power "he is able even to subdue all things to himself."

The hope of the Christian, therefore, cannot fail him. It rests on the power of the Son of God. We know he hath power to raise the dead; to change the vile and corruptible bodies of his faithful servants, and fashion them like unto his own most glorious body, making them thereby capable of living with him in that glory to which his human nature is exalted in the holy city of God most high. He hath promised that he will do so. His word is truth, and shall assuredly be accomplished.

Several inferences, which will be of service to us in the Christian life, may be drawn from what hath been said on this subject.

1. It shows, in a strong light, the necessity of that holy conversation which the Gospel requires. It is the body which, by its lusts and appetites, excites men to mind earthly things, and gives them all the excuse they have for making provision for the flesh. But this body, vile in its present state, the slave of appetite and passion, is, with the soul, the adopted citizen of heaven: It shall be raised from death: It shall be changed from vileness to glory: It shall be made capable of happiness eternal. We ought, therefore, to turn ourselves from earthly to heavenly things; and live in this world according to the manners of that city where glory and happiness are provided for us.

2. The view of the subject that hath been before us, shows the folly and absurdity of gratifying the appetites of the body, beyond what nature and necessity require. They are not to be with us forever; nor are they to make any part of our future happiness. Immoderately pursued, they destroy our capacity of enjoyment even in this life; and, at last, they destroy life itself. Besides, the indulgence of them increases the corruption of our nature, and adds to the dregs and dross of our vile body, all which must be refined and purified, or taken away, before it can be capable of eternal happiness.

He, on the contrary, who considers the lusts and gross appetites of the body as marks of its present vileness; who knows that they must be totaliy abolished before he can be happy with God; and, under that impresson, does his utmost to resist and suppress them; will thereby take off a great part of his present humiliation and vileness.

3. The due consideration of this subject will, by God's grace, help us to bear, with patience and resignation to his will, the wants and distresses of life which arise from the body. Sickness, and decay, and accidents, are the unavoidable attendants of our mortal state. The highest virtue, the most heavenly disposition, secures us not against them. But the faithful Christian knows, and it is his joy to know, that they can endure but for a short time. When God shall call him to rest in the grave, he shall be freed from all the miseries of this world—he shall rest in Jesus till the voice of the Arch-angel shall summon his body from death, to take possession of the kingdom prepared for him from the foundation of the world.

He will, therefore, bear with patience all the evils of life which God sees best for him to endure. A stranger and pilgrim on earth, he will look to heaven as his home, and be content that every thing in this world should be to him as God pleases.

He, on the contrary, who looks to the world for happiness, and expects his highest enjoyments from the gratification of his animal nature, arms all the accidents, and sicknesses, and pains of life, with double force against himself. If he succeed in his views, he hath only the happiness of a brute animal to compensate his pains. If any thing prevent the pleasures he seeks, he must be wretched, for he hath no other expectation left. So foolish is the man who depends on bodily pleasures, and neglects the happiness of the kingdom of God.

4. The change of his mortal body to immortality, for which the pious Christian hopes, and which he knows assuredly he shall attain at the resurrection of the just, by the energy of the power of Christ, will effectually arm him against the terror of death, and comfort him under the loss of his pious friends and connections. To these afflictions we are ever exposed, and often feel their full bitterness. Be it our consolation, that they who die in the Lord are blessed, because they rest from their labours; because, being delivered from the burden of the flesh, and all the miseries of this sinful world, they are in joy and felicity in paradise, waiting for their perfect consummation and bliss, both in body and soul, in the everlasting glory of the heavenly kingdom of God.

5. The piety of treating the dead bodies of Christians, and even the ground in which they are laid, with reverence and respect, appears evident from this view of the subject. Remarkably did this piety appear in the first Christians. Devout men carried holy Stephen to his burial, and made great lamentation for him. Strong was the faith, lively the hope of the first Disciples of Jesus. They laid their dead in the earth, and as much as possible guarded them from violence: Knowing that the grave swallowed them not up for ever, but received them as a trust which it would be obliged punctually to restore, when God should demand it.

In this respect the Church hath happily imitated the example of the first Christians. The dead bodies of her members are committed to the ground with decent and affecting solemnity. She professeth her faith in the Saviour, the “ Lord Jesus Christ ; who is the resurrection and the life ; who shall change our vile body of earth, ashes, and dust, that it may be like unto his glorious body, according to the mighty working whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself.” In the fulness of her faith, she gives thanks to God that he hath been pleased to deliver the faithful departed “ out of the miseries of this sinful world,” and prays for the full accomplishment of the kingdom of glory in the world to come—that we who yet survive may, with all those who are departed in the “ true faith of God’s holy name, have our perfect consummation and bliss, both in body and soul, in his eternal glory, through Jesus Christ our Lord.”

As a mean to accomplish this end, she further prays our merciful God, the “ Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, to raise us from the death of sin unto the life of righteousness, that when we shall depart this life, we may rest in Christ ; and at the general resurrection in the last day, be found acceptable in the sight of God, and receive that blessing which his well-beloved Son shall then pronounce to all who love and fear him, Come, ye blessed children of my Father, receive the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world.”

Be it, then, our steadfast care to live as we pray ; to restrain all sinful desires and actions ; to set our affections on things above; to have regard to the manners of that holy society to which we belong—the city of the new Jerusalem—the Church of the living God enrolled in heaven. By God's goodness we are now members of his militant, suffering Church here on earth. Our faith and hope is, that if we live as that Church directs, and pass the time of our sojourning here in the fear of God, we shall, when the resurrection is past, be made partakers of the glory and blessedness of his Church triumphant in heaven, through the power and merit of him who is the resurrection and the life, Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour. Amen.
